The entrances for spectators and delegates will be at the west end, on Fourteenth street; for officials and reporters at the east end on Thirteenth street, as the platform is at that end. The arrangments for hearing and reporting are the best possible, and it is claimed that the acoustic properties of the hall are so perfect that all the vast multitude can hear an ordinary speaker. Beginning at the east end of the room are the seats behind the chairman, which rise one above the other to the height of thirty feet; then comes the platform proper, for chairman and officials, and in front of that, westward, is a lower platform with tables and chairs for 300 reporters. An open space twenty feet wide extends from this to the first row of Delegates' seats, and these rise two inches to the foot clear back to the west end of the hall. On both sides of the hall are lines of boxes, entered from narrow passages behind them; above these private boxes are the rows of seats for spectators, and above them again the great galleries, in which the seats rise circus fashion. The entrances will be few, so that all but ticket holders can be easily excluded; but many exits can be provided which can be instantly thrown open, so that in case of fire or panic from any cause the hall can be cleared in a few minutes. It is estimated that if all available standing room be utilized, about 13,500 people can witness the proceedings.

Three aisles run the length of the hall, the middle one six feet wide. The committee have had all the supports thoroughly examined and tested, and their strength is guaranteed to be sufficient to remove even the possibilty of accident. The entire interior will be decorated in the most lavish manner to an extent never before seen in a national convention hall. The exterior will be decorated somewhat less lavishly.

Lynched by a Mob.

At Viroqua, Wisconsin, a young man named Andrew Granstaff was arrested for the murder of the Drake family. Grandstaff is twenty-five years of age and has borne a hard reputation up and down the Kickapoo, where he has made his headquarters. For several years many depredations have been laid at his door, but he has never been arrested for them. The arrest was made by C. J. Farrell, of the Pinkerton Detective Agency of Chicago who has done vigilant work during the twenty-four hours he has been on the ground.

In substance Grandstaff's confession is that he called at Drake's house and asked for a drink, which was given him. Then he demanded money. Drake refused, and he shot him dead. Mrs. Drake, who was putting the children to bed, ran out and met her death. The children were both awake when their throats were cut. The murderer rifled the house and fled. This does not fully agree with the position of the bodies. At a late hour one thousand determined men surrounded the jail, but the authorities refused to give up the prisoner. The barricades were then broken down and the officers were overpowered. An hour was spent in breaking down the steel cage and then the prisoner fought with desperat fury against the mob that sought t enter. The struggle did not last lon and he was taken out, boun hand and foot, led to th porch below, and there preparation were made to hang him. A rope was place around his neck and the prisoner was ask ed what he had to say. He protested i nocence, but it was known that he ha made a full confession in the afternoo and he was not believed. After the secon elevation to the court house oak he ma a statement that he, Frank and Elish Carey had the murder concocted and th they had the deed accomplished before arrived at the house. None of the abo is thought to be true. Grandstaff hu for eleven minutes before life was extinct

TALMAGE'S SERMON.

The Brooklyn Divine Discourses on Topics Incident to Every-Day Life.

The subject of the eloquent doctor's discourse was: "Disabled Hunters Bringing Down the Most Game." His text was from Isaiah, xxxiii, 23.

The lame take the prey.

The utter demolition of the Assyrian host was here predicted. Not only robust men should go forth and gather the spoils of conquest, but even men crippled of arm and crippled of foot should go out and capture much that was valuable. Their physical disadvantages should not hinder their great enrichment. So it has been in the past, so it is now, so it will be in the future. So it is in all departments. Men labor under seemingly great disadvantages, and amid the most unfavorable circumstances, yet making grand achievements, getting great blessing for themselves, great blessing for the world, great blessing for the church, and so "the lame take the prey."

Do you know that the three great poets of the world were totally blind? Homer, Ossian, John Milton. Do you know that Mr. Prescott, who wrote that enchanting book, "The Conquest of Mexico," never saw Mexico—could not even see the paper on which he was writing? A framework across the sheet, between which, up and down, went the pen immortal. Do you know that Gambassio, the sculptor, could not see the marble before him, or the chisel with which he cut it into shapes bewitching? Do you know that Alexander Pope, whose poems will last as long as the English language, was so much of an invalid that he had to be sewed up every morning in rough canvass in order to stand on his feet at all?

Do you know that Stuart, the celebrated painter, did much of his wonderful work under the shadow of the dungeon, where he had been unjustly imprisoned for debt? Do you know that Demosthenes by almost superhuman exertion first had to conquer the lisp of his own speech before he conquered assemblages with his eloquence? Do you know that Bacon struggled all through innumerable sicknesses and that Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott went limping on clubfoot through all their lives, and that many of the great poets and painters and orators and historians and heroes of the world had something to keep them back and pull them down and impede their way and cripple their physical or their intellectual movement, and yet that they pushed on and pushed up until they reached the spoils of wordly success, and amid the huzza of nations and centuries "the lame took the prey?"

You know that a vast multitude of these men started under the disadvantage of obscure parentage. Columbus, the son of the weaver. Ferguson, the astronomer, the son of the shepherd. America the prey of the one; worlds on worlds the prey of the other. But what is true in secular directions is more true in spiritual and religious directions, and I proceed to prove it.

There are in all communities many invalids. They never know a well day. They adhere to their occupations, but they go panting along the streets with exhaustion, and at evening they lie down on the lounge with achings beyond all medicament. They have tried all prescriptions, they have gone through all the cures which were proclaimed infallible, and they have come now to surrender to perpetual ailments. They consider they are among many disadvantages; and when they see those who are buoyant in health pass by, they almost envy their robust frames and easy respiration.

But I have noticed among that invalid class those who have the greatest knowledge of the Bible, who are in nearest intimacy with Jesus Christ, who have the most glowing experience of the truth, who have had the most remarkable answers to prayer, and who have most exhilarant anticipations of heaven. The temptations which weary us who are in robust health they have conquered. They have divided among them the spoils of the conquest. Many who are alert and athletic and swarthy loiter in the way. These are the lame that take the prey. Robert Hall, an invalid; Edward Payson, an invalid; Richard Baxter, an invalid; Samuel Rutherford, an invalid. This morning, when you want to call to mind those who are most Christlike, you think of some darkened room in your father's house from which there went forth an influence potent for eternity.

A step farther; Through raised letters the art of printing has been brought to the attention of the blind.

You take up the Bible for the blind, and you close your eyes, and you run your fingers over the raised letters, and you say: "Why I never could get any information in this way. What a slow, cumbrous way of reading! God help the blind!"

And yet I find among that class of persons, the blind, the deaf and the dumb, the most thorough acquaintance with God's word. Shut out from all other sources of information, no sooner does their hand touch the raised letters than they gather a prayer. Without eyes they, look off upon the kingdoms of God's love. Without hearing, they catch the minstrelsy of the skies. Dumb, yet with pencil, or with irradiant countenance, they declare the glory of God.

A large audience assembled in New York at the anniversary of the Deaf and Dumb asylum, and one of the visitors with chalk on the blackboard wrote this question to the pupils: "Do you not find it very hard to be deaf and dumb?" And one of the pupils took the chalk and wrote on the blackboard this sublime sentence in answer: "When the song of the angels shall burst upon our enraptured ear we will scarce regret that our ears were never marred with earthly sounds." Oh! the brightest eyes in heaven will be those that never saw on earth. The ears most alert in heaven will be those that in this world heard neither voice of friend, nor thrum of harp, nor carol of bird, nor doxology of congregations.

A lad who had been blind from infancy was cured. The oculist operated upon the lad and then put a very heavy bandage over the eyes, and after a few weeks had gone by the bandage was removed, and the mother said to her child: "Willie, can you see?" He said: "Oh! mamma, is this heaven?" The contrast between the darkness before and the brightness afterward was overwhelming. And I tell you the glories of heaven will be a thousand fold brighter for those who never saw anything on earth. While many with good vision closed their eyes in night, and many who had a good, artistic, and cultured ear went down into discord, these afflicted ones cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and He made their sorrows their advantage, and so "the lame take the prey."

In the seventh century there was a legend of St. Modobert. It was said that his mother was blind, and one day while looking as his mother he felt so sympathetic for her blindness that he rushed forward and kissed her blind eyes, and, the legend says, her vision came immediately. That was only a legend, but it is a truth, glorious truth, that a kiss of God's eternal love has brought to many a blind eye eternal illumination.

A step further: There are those in all communities who toil mightily for a livelihood. They have scant wages. Perhaps they are diseased or have physical infirmities, so they are hindered from doing a continuous day's work. A city missionary finds them up the dark alley, with no fire, with thin clothing, with very coarse bread. They never ride in the street-car; they can not afford the 5 cents. They never see any pictures save those in the show-window on the street, from which they are often jostled and looked at by someone who seems to say in the look, "Move on! what are you doing here looking at pictures?"

Yet many of them live on mountains of transfiguration. At their rough table He who fed the five thousand breaks the bread. They talk often of the good times that are coming. This world has no charm for them, but heaven entrances their spirit. They often divide their scant crust with some forlorn wretch who knocks at their door at night, and on the blast of the night wind, as the door opens to let them in, is heard the voice of Him who said: "I was hungry and ye fed me." No color of heaven will be too bright to transport them. By God's help they have vanquished the Assyrian host. They have divided among them the spoils. Lame, lame, yet they took the prey.

I was riding along the country road one day and I saw a man on crutches. I overtook him. He was very old. He was going very slowly. At that rate it would have taken him two hours to go a mile. I said: "Wouldn't you like to ride?" He said: "Thank you I would. God bless you." When he sat beside me he said: You see, I am very lame and very old, but the Lord has been a good Lord to me. I have buried all my children. The Lord gave them and the Lord had a right to take them away. Blessed be His name. I was very sick and I had no money and my neighbors came in and took care of me and I wanted nothing. I suffer a great deal with pain, but then I have so many mercies left. The Lord has been a good Lord to me." And before we got far I was in doubt whether I was giving him a ride or he was giving me a ride! He said: "Now, if you please, I'll get out here. Just help me down on my crutches, if you please. God bless you. Thank you, sir. Good morning. Good morning. You have been feet to the lame, sir, you have. Good morning." Swarthy men had gone the road that day. I do not know where they came out, but every hobble of that old man was toward the shining gate. With his old crutch he had struck down many a Sennacherib of temptation which has mastered you and me. Lame, so fearfully lame, so awfully lame; but he took the prey.

A step further: There are in all communities many orphans. During our last war and in the years immediately following how many children we heard say: "Oh! my father was killed in the war." Have you ever noticed—I fear you have not—how well these children have turned out? Starting under the greatest disadvantages, no orphan asylum could do for them what their father would have done had he lived. The skirmisher sat one night, by the light of fagots, in the swamp writing a letter home, when a sharpshooter's bullet ended the letter which was never folded, never posted, and never read.

Those children came up under great disadvantage. No father to fight their way for them. Perhaps there was in the old family Bible an old yellow letter pasted fast, which told the story of that father's long march, and how he suffered in the hospital; but they looked still further on in the Bible, and they came to the story of how God is the Father of the fatherless, and the widow's portion, and they soon took their father's place in the household. They battled the way for their mother. They came on up, and many of them have in the years since the war taken positions in church and state. While many who suffered nothing during those times have had sons go out into lives of indolence and vagabondage, these who started under so many disadvantages because they were so early bereft, these are the lame that took the prey.

A step further: There are those who would like to do good. They say: "Oh, if I only had wealth, or, if I had eloquence, or, if I had high social position, how much I would accomplish for God and the church!" I stand here to-day to tell you that you have great opportunities for usefulness.

Who built the pyramids? The king who ordered them built? No; the plain workmen who added stone after stone and stone after stone. Who built the dikes of Holland? the government that ordered the enterprise? No; the plain workmen who carried the earth and rung their trowel on the wall. Who are those who have built these vast cities? The capitalists? No; the carpenters, the masons, the plumber, the plasterers, the tinners, the roofers, dependent on a day's wages for a livelihood. And so in the great work of assuaging human suffering and enlightening human ignorance and halting human iniquity. In that great work the chief part is to be done by ordinary men, with ordinary speech, in an ordinary manner, and by ordinary means. The trouble is that in the army of Christ we all want to be captains and colonels and brigadier generals. We are not willing to march with the rank and file and do duty with the private soldier. We want to belong to the reserve corps, and read about the battle while warming ourselves at the camp fires or on furlough at home, our feet upon an ottoman, we sagging back into an arm-chair.

As you go down the street you see an excavation and four or five men are working, and perhaps twenty or thirty leaning on the rail looking over at them. That is the way it is in the church of God to-day; where you find one Christian hard at work there are fifty men watching the job.

Oh! my friends, why do you not go to work and preach this gospel? You say: "I have no pulpit." You have. It may be the carpenter's bench, it may be the mason's wall. The robe in which you are to proclaim this gospel may be a shoemaker's apron. But woe unto you if you do not preach this gospel somewhere, somehow! If this world is ever brought to Christ it will be through the unanimous and long continued efforts of men who, waiting for no special endowment, consecrate to God what they have. Among the most useless people in the world are men with ten talents, while many a one with only two talents, or no talent at all, is doing a great work, and so "the lame take the prey."

There are thousands of ministers of whom you have never heard—in log cabins in the west, in mission chapels at the east—who are warring against the legions of darkness, successfully warring. Tract-distributors, month by month undermining the citadels of sin. You do not know their going or their coming; but the footfalls of their ministry are heard in the palaces of heaven. Who are the workers in our Sabbath schools throughout this land to-day? Men celebrated, men brilliant men of vast estate? For the most part, not that at all. I have noticed that the chief characteristic of the most of these who are successful in the work is that they knew their bibles, are earnest in prayer, are anxious for the salvation of the young, and Sabbath after Sabbath are willing to sit down unobserved and tell of Christ and the resurrection. These are the humble workers who are recruiting the great army of Christian youth—not by might, not by power, not by profound argument, not by brilliant antithesis, but by the blessing of God on plain talk, and humble story, and silent tear, and anxious look. "The lame take the prey."

Oh, this work of saving the youth of our country—how few appreciate what it is! This generation tramping on to the grave—we will soon all be gone. What next?

An engineer on a locomotive going across the western prairies day after day saw a little child come out in front of a cabin and wave to him, so he got in the habit of waving back to the little child, and it was the day's joy to him to see this little one come out in front of the cabin door and wave to him, while he answered back.

One day the train was belated, and it came on to the dusk of the evening. As the engineer stood at his post he saw by the headlight that little girl on the track, wondering why the train did not come, looking for the train, knowing nothing of its peril. A great horror seized upon the engineer. He reversed the engine. He gave it in charge of the other man on board, and then he climbed over the engine, and he came down on the cow-catcher. He said, though he had reversed the engine it seemed as though it were going at lightning speed, faster and faster, though it was really slowing up; and with almost supernatural clutch he caught that child by the hair and lifted it up, and when the train stopped and the passengers gathered around to see what was the matter. There the old engineer lay, fainted dead away, the little child alive and in his swarthy arms.

"Oh!" you say, "that was well done." But I want you to exercise some kindness and some appreciation toward those in community who are snatching the little ones from under the wheels of temptation and sin—snatching them from under thundering rail-trains of eternal disaster, bringing them up into respectability in this world and into glory for the world to come. You appreciate what the engineer did; why can you not appreciate the grander work done by every Sabbath-school teacher this afternoon?

Oh, my friends, I want to impress upon myself and upon yourselves that it is not the number of talents we possess, but the use we make of them.

God has a royal family in the world. Now, if I should ask, 'Who are the royal families of history?' you would say, "House of Hapsburg, house of Stuarts, house of Bourbons." They lived in palaces and had great equipage. But who are the Lord's royal family? Some of them may serve you in the household, some of them are in unlighted garrets, some of them will walk this afternoon down the street, on their arm a basket of broken food; some of them are in the almshouse, despised and rejected of men, yet in the last great day, while it will be found that some of us who fared sumptuously every day are hurled back into discomfiture, there are the lame that will take the prey.

One step further: There are a great many people discouraged about getting to heaven. You are brought up in good families, you had Christian parentage, but you frankly tell me that you are a thousand miles away from the right track.

My brother, you are the one I want to preach to this morning. I have been looking for you. I want to tell you how you got astray. It was not maliciousness on your part. It was perhaps through the geniality and sociability of your nature that you fell into sin. You wandered away from your duty, you unconsciously left the house of God; you admit the gospel to be true, and yet you have so grievously and so prolongedly wandered you say rescue is impossible.

It would take a week to count up the names of those in heaven who were on earth worse than you tell me you are. They went the whole round of iniquity, they disgraced themselves, they disgraced their household, they despaired of return because their reputation was gone, their property was gone, everything was gone; but in some hour like this they heard the voice of God and threw themselves on the divine compassion, and they rose up more than conquerors. And I tell you there is the same chance for you. That is one reason why I like to preach this gospel, so free a gospel, so tremendous a gospel. It takes a man all wrong and makes him all right.

In a former settlement where I preached a member of my congregation quit the house of God, quit respectable circles, went into all styles of sin, and was slain of his iniquity. The day for his burial came, and his body was brought into the house of God. Some of his comrades who had destroyed him were overheard along the street, on the way to the burial, saying: "Come, let us go and hear Talmage damn this old sinner!" Oh! I had nothing but tears for the dead, and I had nothing but invitations for the living. You see I could not do otherwise. "Christ Jesus came to seek and to save that which was lost." Christ in his dying prayer said: "Father, forgive them," and that was a prayer for you and for me. Oh! start on the road to heaven to-day. You are not happy. The thirst of your soul will never be slaked by the fountains of sin. You turn everywhere but to God for help. Right where you are, call on Him. He knows you, He knows all about you, He knows all the odds against which you have been contending in life. Do not go to Him with a long rigmarole of a prayer, but just look up and say: "Help! Help!"

But you say: "My hand trembles so from my dissipations, I can't even take hold of a hymnbook to sing." Do not worry about that, my brother; I will give out a hymn at the close so familiar you can sing it without a book. But you say: "The wrong I did was to one dead and in heaven now, and I can't correct that wrong." You can correct it. By the grace of God, go into the presence of that one, and the apologies you ought to have made on earth make in heaven.

"Oh!" says some man, "if I should try and do right, if I should turn away from my evil doing unto the Lord I would be jostled, I would be driven back, nobody would have any sympathy for me." You are mistaken. Here, in the presence of the church on earth and heaven, I give you to-day the right hand of Christian fellowship. God sent me here to-day to preach this and He sent you here to hear this: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thought, and let him return unto the Lord, who will have mercy, and unto our God who will abundantly pardon." Though you may have been the worst sinner you may become the best saint and in the great day of judgment it will be found that "where sin abounded grace does much more abound," and while the spoils of an everlasting kingdom are being awarded for your pursuit, it will be found that the lame took the prey. Blessed be God that we are this Sabbath one week nearer the obliteration of all the inequalities of this life and all its disquietudes.

Years ago on a boat on the North River the pilot gave a very sharp ring to the bell for the boat to slow up. The engineer attended to the machinery, and then he came up with some alarm on deck to see what was the matter. He saw it was a moonlight night and there were no obstacles in the way. He went to the pilot and said: "Why did you ring the bell in that way? Why do you want to stop? There's nothing the matter." And the pilot said to him: "There is a mist gathering on the river; don't you see that? and there is night gathering darker and darker, and I can't see the way." Then the engineer, looking around and seeing it was bright moonlight, looked into the face of the pilot and saw that he was dying, and then that he was dead.

God grant that when our last moment comes we way be found at our post doing our whole duty; and when the mists of the river of death gather on our eyelids may the good Pilot take the wheel from our hands and guide us into the calm harbor of eternal rest!

How to Keep Healthy.

Never go to bed with cold or damp feet.

Never lean with the back upon anything that is cold.

Never begin a journey until the breakfast has been eaten.

Never take warm drinks and then immediately go out into the cold.

Never omit regular bathing, for unless the skin is in active condition the cold will close the pores and favor congestion and other diseases.

After exercise of any kind never ride in an open carriage or near the window of a car for a moment; it is dangerous to health, or even life.

Merely warm the back by the fire, and never continue keeping the back exposed to heat after it has become comfortably warm. To do so is debilitating.

When hoarse speak as little as possible until the hoarseness is recovered from, else the voice may be permanently lost or difficulties of the throat be produced.

When going from a warm atmosphere into a cooler one keep the mouth closed, so that the air may be warmed in its passage through the nose ere it reaches the lungs.

Never stand still in cold weather, especially after having taken a slight degree of exercise, and always avoid standing on ice or snow, or where the person is exposed to the cold wind.

Keep the back, especially between the shoulder-blades, well covered; also the chest well protected. In sleeping in a cold room establish a habit of breathing through the nose, and never with the mouth open.

A Traveling Quack's Trick.

A traveling medicine van stopped in the fashionable suberb of Stapleton. It was equipped with a lecturer, a comic vocalist, a violin player and an actress. The charlatan himself made what he called a scientific medical address, the point of which was that the sure way to be cured of anything whatever was to buy a bottle of his wonderful panacea. The singer and the fidler gathered the crowd for him, and held it by songs and playing whenever his oratory lost its grip on their attention. The actress was not ostensibly a part of the show. She played a difficult and essential role. In the guise of a rheumatic old woman, she hobbled in among the multitude on crutches, and was singled out by the practitioner.

"Come here, my good woman," he said, "and I will cure you gratis."

"You couldn't do it if I let you try," she replied: "more than a hundred doctors have failed, and I guess I'll have to die a cripple."

She permitted herself to be persuaded, however, and at length was seated in a chair in front of the gorgeous wagon. The quack set a screen around her for several minutes, in the pretense that he was applying his miraculous lotion to her rheumatic leg. When she was disclosed with a flourish to the gaze of the crowd again she stood upright, walked about on her supposedly cured limbs, and vehemently declared that a miracle had been wrought. The sale of the bottled liquid was brisk for a while after that. I should not have suspected the woman of malingering, for she did it cleverly, only that I had seen her go through with precisely the same performance the week before, and less than ten miles away. I learned that she was a somewhat broken down but still clever impersonator of old women, and the manager of the medical show is her brother.—New York Sun.

He Took His Bell Punch Home

Omaha Bee.

"One of the boys had a good joke played on him the other day," said an Omaha gripman. "One of the conductors took his bell punch home with him and as he did not go out until noon next day he slept until about 9o'clock. While he was visiting the land of Nod the children got the punch and were amusing themselves with it when their mamma caught them at it. She took the machine away from them and forgot to tell the old man, who after eating his breakfast skipped off to work with out noticing that anything was wrong. Well, the next day when he reported at the office the superintendent told him that he was just 1,326 fares short. It paralyzed him for a while, and then he asked how it was, and they showed him the record. You see the 'con' all carry a book in addition to the punch, and every time they collect a fare they mark it on the book as well as pulling the punch. When you leave the office the number indicated by your bell punch is taken, and when you come in it is also taken, the former subtracted from the latter, which gives the number of fares and must agree with the book record. This conductor asked time to go home and return and when he got back he was able to explain. But he does not carry that bell punch home any more. He leaves it at the office."

In a Lumber Slash.

A doctor of divinity, who writes to the Forest and Stream of his angling adventures, tells of being stuck in a "slash:" Presently we came to a "lumber slash." This signifies a section of forest where hemlock trees have been felled in the winter, their trunks peeled off the marketable bark, and then left to decay. The stumps here were about six feet high, indicating the depth of snow on the ground at the time the woodman did his work; the branches remained on the prone trees, making an almost impenetrable barricade. It is easier getting a comb through a tramp's hair than a fly-rod through such a labyrinth of dry brush. Alas! for me that I was in haste. Alas again that it is my fate to wear eyeglasses. Alas! once more that Johnny had fallen headlong and sadly scratched his face and torn his jacket. I own I felt embarrassed. When I gathered up my senses for a calm survey, this I found to be the condition of things My haste had served to wind my line and rod around at least three dozen twigs; my eyeglasses had gone, cord and all; I was corraled by fallen trees. Go ahead I could not; to go back seemed almost impossible. With Johnny's help, however, I recovered my eyeglasses; he discovered them hanging on a limb; I deliberately proceeded to untwist and unsnarl my line and to carefully encase my rod. Johnny, meanwhile, had been calling for our guide.

Encourage the Editor.

As a rule, an editor gets about 1,000 kicks to one caress. Once in a while he gets a kind word, and it warms and cheers his weather beaten storm racked heart to the innermost core. Most people are afraid to tell an editor when he writes an article that particularly pleases them, for fear of making him proud, we suppose, but if they find anything that does not accord precisely with their views, they will neglect their business to hunt him up and tell him of it. Pshaw! dear friends, don't think you will spoil the editor by giving him an occasional word of cheer, any more than you will spoil your child by complimenting it upon a piece of patchwork it has finished. Of course you could beat the job yourself, but that doesn't deter you from heaping words of encouragement on the child. It has done its best. So you could doubtless beat the average editor at running a paper? Of course, you can. The man does not live who can't beat an editor at running a paper. The editor is willing to acknowledge that you can. He only runs it because you have not time to; but this fact need not deter you from giving him a word of encouragement occasionally.—Dansville(N.Y.) Breeze.

The Rights of Inventors

When an inventor brings out something that accomplishes a useful purpose not before accomplished, or does this better or more economically than it has been done, it is reasonably certain he has invented something in the value of which he has an interest. And this point is the one that is overlooked by those who declaim against the rights of inventors in favor of some one who tried to do something similar twenty years before. The very fact that the party who tried first did not succeed is fairly good evidence that he did not make the invention. All recent construction of patent law is in favor of sustaining the inventor who accomplishes something, as against the man who tried and failed, even though the means used are very similar. And this is justice and common sense. The patent laws are presumably in the interest of the public, and the public is interested in the inventor to exactly the extent that it is benefited by him. —American Machinist.

John Stevens, a young man about town, was standing in a cigar store under the Adams Express building in Chicago, when James Bell, a young business man of Hyde Park, approached, took out a penknife and deliberately cut off Steven's ear. Placing it in his pocket he coolly disappeared and has not been seen since. It is said that the act was done to punish Stevens for his undue intimacy with Mrs. Bell.

Petros Buckman, son of John Buckman, janitor of the normal school at St. Cloud broke his leg. This is the sixteenth fracture the boy has had of his legs and arms, and he is not six years old. His bones are so brittle that they are broken merely by a fall on the floor or in the yard, and he has to be constantly watched.

Some idea of what Rosco Conkling thought of death may be gained from his eulogy of Oliver P. Morton, delivered shortly after that stateman's death, in the Senate Chamber. "Death," he said, "is nature's supreme abhorence. The dark valley, with its weired and solemn shadows, illumined by the rays of Christianity, is still the ground which man shudders to approach. The grim portals and the narrow house seem in the lapse of centuries to have gained rather than lost in impressive and foreboding horror.

"Just Hear That Child Scream!"

said Mrs. Smith to her sister, Mrs. Davis, as the sound of a child's shrieks came across the garden from a neighbor's house. "What kind of a woman have you for a neighbor? Does she abuse her children?" "No, indeed," replied Mrs. Davis. "She is one of the most tender mothers in existence. But you see, she believes in the old-fashioned styles of doctoring. When a child needs physic, she fills a spoon with some nauseous dose, lays the little victim flat on her lap, holds his nose till he is forced to open his mouth for breath; when down goes the dreadful mess. Then come the yells." "No wonder," said Mrs. Smith, "Why doesn't she use Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets? They are effective without being harsh, and are as easy to take as sugar plums. I always give them to my children." "And so do I," said Mrs. Davis.

The Little Seed.

A little shoot bowed in the strong wind's wrath:
A little shrub grew, by its roots held fast;
Then a stout tree braved all the winter's blast.

A little cough started—'twas only light;
A little chill shivered the hours of night;
A little pain came and began to grow,
Then consumption laid all his brave strength low.

Be wise in time. Check the little cough, cure the little chill, dispell the little pain, ere the little ailment becomes the strong, unconquerable giant of disease. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical discovery, taken in time, is a remedy for these ills.

THE MYSTERY OF BAKE.

One fair sunshiny morning in March, Lansing Phillips was walking down town to his business place, the firm of Tatt, Brother & Co., No.—Wall street, New York. It was recognized as an estimable and reputable firm in every respect except, perhaps—but this dark cloud on its fair fame was known only to those officially connected with it—in the selection and retention of its office boy, Harry Baker, commonly called Bake; a youth against whom everybody in the business, from President Tatt to old Patsey, the furnace man, had cause of grievance. Lansing Phillips, an agreeable, good-tempered fellow in the main as one would find from Harlem to the Battery, nevertheless was frowning considerable as he hurried along in the sunlight. Both buttons were missing from his glove, a fact which he felt sure was directly traceable to the diversions of Bake, whom he had discovered the day before arrayed in his tall hat and his best ulster (which trailed on the dusty floor), giving an imitation of Mr. Phillips' walk and bearing for the edification of the other clerks at luncheon hour. He knew, also, that it was quite useless to complain of the depredations of the culprit in question, and that this count in the indictment against Bake was but one of many. When he reflected that the promising youth had spilled a bottle of ink over the elder Tatt's new writing desk had dumped an oil can into the younger Tatt's box of choice cigars and gone unpunished, he could but feel the futility of warring against fate in this particular shape. It was a pleasant enough shape, too, by the way an active, lithe young figure, full of life and movement, with brown hair tossing and falling above an open, handsome face, whose guileless blue eyes look straight into yours, with the most sublime indifference as to your wishes or opinions, or, indeed, your existance generally.

For some time the advent of this boy and his subsequent outrages had been a theme of wonder in the office, and also the fact that he received five dollars a week and perquisites for keeping the place in an uproar. But the world learns to respect established conditions, and the employees at Tatts' learned, in time that Bake was an evil that must be tolerated. Nor were there wanting dark hints to the effect that the elder Tatt, a bachelor of sixty-five, was under some special obligations in the matter of Bake. Old Patsey even went so far as to trace a personal resemblance between the two, who were about as much alike as a huge, lumbering Newfoundland dog and a little young deerhound. Bake was only thirteen, he was in perfect health and in the possession of small lungs and limbs, and the house of Tatt & Co., suffered accordingly.

On these things Mr. Phillips, having failed to button his glove, pondered as he went down town. Suddenly, however, the cause of his thought was checked and changed. As he neared a certain corner he saw coming from the opposite side of the street a stylish and beautiful young girl who was crossing under the horses' heads with the fearlessness born of long practice in a dangerous art. In her daintily gloved hand she carried a large, rough looking basket, which she sat down on the curb-stone as soon as it was reached, and then returned rapidly over the crossing to a poorly dressed old woman, whom she took by the arm and conducted safely across. Lansing stood still in amazement. The beauty of the girl, her brilliant smile, the sweetness of her voice when she spoke, seemed to rivet him to the spot.

"Never mind," she was saying, with a sort of imperative kindness, stopping a flood of thanks from her charge as they stepped up on the pavement. "Now, where do you want to go? Essex street? Well, don't try to walk. At the next corner you will find a car to take you therefore," transferring some pieces of money from her velvet purse to the old, withered hand. "I would go with you and see you safely on, only I'm in a hurry, but—a blue car, remember."

And here her eyes met Lansing's. He was staring at her with undisguised admiration, but the glance that dwelt on him for a second or two seemed as calmly indifferent as Bake's own—bright, careless, scrutinizing. Then she turned and went down the street with a step like air. It is needless to say that Lansing followed her, but with a reverent heart, as one might follow a passing angel. When at last she disappeared through the doorway of an immense office building, Lansing breathed a blessing after her and went his way with a strange, sweet warmth at his heart as of some bright, new-kindled flame.

It is not to be wondered at that as often thereafter as he passed over that area of ground from the spot where he had seen her first to the place his vision lost her, he watched and waited for another glimpse. It seemed as if all the beautiful women in New York went up and down and down and up but the face his spirit yearned for.

He never saw her again, and the sense of despair began to press on his heart like a weight. Despair is an excellant medicine sometimes, especially for minds to which it is extremely unpalatable. Lansing revolted from the bitter draught Fate's hand proffered so persistently, and the enegy of resistance caused a diversion in his favor. He was actually beginning to combat the foolish longing to see again those "unforgotten eyes," and getting courage to walk up town by a different route when Fate interfered again in his affairs and from quite an opposite direction.

It all came about through the unexpected illness of Bake. He had been absent from business a day or two, and then word was sent that he had caught cold, but would shortly reappear at his post. Meanwhile peace and tranquility reigned in the office and prayers were offered up daily, but not for his speedy recovery.

"Mebbe if he's kept on his back for a month or two he'll not be so full of all his tricks hereafter," old Patsey said, hopefully. However, when a week had gone and calm remained still undisturbed, Tatt senior addressd his forces generally one day just at closing time.

"See here, boys, some of you go up town near Seventy-sixth street, don't you?"

Mr. Phillips felt constrained by truth to answer that his station was at Sixty-ninth.

"Very well, I wish you'd take Bake's salary to him, and find out just how he is. I'll feel obliged if you'll attend to this to-night, and report to me."

Mr. Phillips bowed and went back to his desk in a most exasperated state of mind. He had promised to meet his cousin at the Grand Central and go out of town, by a five o'clock train, to pay a long planned visit, and here his arrangements were completely set aside for the benefit and convenience of Bake, who was never in the slightest degree known to discommode himself for the benefit or convenience of any one. However, there was nothing for it but obedience. As soon as Mr. Tatt had gone he lost no time in telephoning his cousin this chance of plans and his disgust thereat. Then, buttoning on his overcoat, he tried to walk himself into a state of resignation. Failing in this he boarded the elevated at Fourteenth street and rode up town.

"Does Henry Baker live here?"

"Yes, sir. Did—did you—wish to—see him?"

And then the fair young creature who had stammered out this question made a little backward move out into the hall and burst into a flood of tears.

Mr. Phillips stood aghast for two reasons. The sight of a beautiful woman so overcome by painful emotion was enough to agitate any man not utterly hardened to tender influences, but the wild and sudden beating of his heart was due to an entirely different cause. In the soft eyes and voice, in the lovely face he had recognized his divinity of the street crossing, the vision that had haunted him, vaguely yet ceaselessly, with its bewildering memory.

"I beg your pardon." He faltered out the words, afraid to advance, or even to speak, and yet couscious of tumultuous joy within. "Is Harry—is he——"

"Oh, my poor, poor brother."

"Not dead?" said Lansing, shocked into something like firmness, "Oh, surely not!"

"N-no—but so ill—so ill. The doctor has prepared us for the worst."

"Oh, now, now; take courage. Don't give way like this." Lansing heard his own strong, cheery tone, with suprise and admiration. Harry has a splendid constitution. He is so strong; so full of life. We've often spoken of it at the office (they had, indeed); a young, healthy fellow like him has a thousand chances. Is he too ill to see any one? Mr. Tatt sent me up; he wished me to report personally. If you think it would not harm your brother——"

"He is very quiet. He knows us all," with a sob.

"Well, you might ask him—you might say to him that Phillips is here."

"I have often heard him speak of you," she said, gently. "I think if he would care to see anyone, he would like to see you."

"Hello," said Bake faintly, and with a feeble wink. His visitor sat down on the bedside and put his strong hand over the thin fingers outheld to him. Could this be Bake's vigorous young fist, this poor, limp member that lay so loosely in his clasp?

"Hello, old fellow, hello. Do you know this won't do? We can't spare you from the office any longer."

He felt a little qualm at this unconscionable invention, but Bake evidently had faith in the statement.

"Oh, well, in a week or two," he said with difficulty but reassuringly. "How's Patsey—all of 'em—old Tatt?"

"He sent me up here—salary day, you know." Lansing laid the money on the counterpane. "He says you're to be down on Monday."

"What's he—giving—us? Tell him—the Monday after, sure! That was Eda—my sister. Mother,s in England—she's coming, soon."

The beautiful eyes wandered and closed, but the frail fingers kept their grasp.

"Have you any message—anything you'd like to say?" Lansing asked, clearing his throat, after a moment.

"Tell them I'll be down. Tell old Patsey he's a first-rate fellow. I won't tease him any more. Tell him that."

"Yes, Bake," in a husky tone.

Another silence. Presently Lansing moved slightly and the large eyes opened again.

"Say, Phillips, don't go."

"What, my boy?"

"Don't go. Stay here, can't you? All women round me and—they cry. You won't mind sitting up one night will you? Eda, she's tired out. I'll feel better to-morrow, only—you stay."

"Of course, old fellow, of course I'll stay," said Lansing, tenderly. The strangest sensations seemed to crowd round his heart and oppress him. This bountiful turn of destiny had brought him face to face with what he had longed for too suddenly for a realizing sense of happiness, especially in the midst of sad conditions. "But I must go now' you know, and report to the Fat Boy," which was Bake's name for the head of the firm, and which he smiled to hear, "and then I'll come back and stay. I'll stay as long as you want me. Is that all right?"

And Lansing did hurry. After a short conference with Eda on the stairhead, in which his eyes worshiped and his tongue stammered, he was off across town like lightning. When he rrturned, Dr. L——, the eminent specialist, came with him. This visit, it afterward appeared, was made at the urgent personal solicitation of Senior Tatt himself. The great physician asked few questions, but looked long and gravely at the quiet, listless face on the pillow, then beckoned Lansing to the adjoining room, where Eda waited.

"There is one chance for him—a slight one," he said speaking softly and rapidly. "It involves an entire change of treatment, if you are willing," including Eda and Lansing in a single glance, "I can't promise as to the result, but I think it worth the risk to give him this chance, since in it he will never recover under the present conditions."

Eda looked at Lansing as if she implored him to decide. "We are quite willing, doctor," he said, firmly.

And so the chance was given to Bake to stop short of that place where boys are always, and come back for a while longer to the occupation for which nature and inclination had designed him, viz., that of tormenting his fellow mortals. It was a slow and wearying process for poor Bake, this return to his normal condition, but to Lansing Phillips the same space of time seemed a swift-winged period of ecstatic bliss. To say that he was in love with Eda would be a wretchedly commonplace manner of expressing his sentiment. He was so much in love with her that he trembled lest she should even remotely guess at the state of his feelings. He looked at the light, fluffy hair above her forehead, and wondered if there was ever granted to man such bliss as it would be to him to press his cheek against the soft, bright fringe, or kiss just once the smooth, white space above her eyes. He watched her as she moved about, and listened to her voice in a sort of speechless delirium.

Mrs. Baker, who had arrived a few days after Dr. L——'s first visit, remarked of Mr. Phillips "that he was a lovely fellow, but seemed to be half asleep on his feet." Eda remarked nothing in words. She appeared to be utterly absorbed in her brother, and it was only through his interest in this important personage that Lansing received any share whatever of her attention.

For nearly three weeks Mr. Phillips spent every evening of his life in Bake's sick room, floating along delightfully in a steady current of happiness; but currents of all kinds, even of ill-luck, are apt to meet with some sort of a check sooner or later, and it is always a sudden one. Lansing had spent a long, blissful evening watching Eda at her embroidery and incidentally playing draughts with Bake. He had allowed himself to be beaten shamefully, as usual, and the game concluded with much hilarity on the part of the victor.

"Well, Eda, you just ought to see us down at the office sometimes. You'd never think we'd be such good friends as we now are, would she, Lanse?" Bake was lying back on the lounge looking calmly reminiscent.

"We always fight about six times a day. Tell you he's got a temper. You'd never think so to see him like he is up here."

Lansing smiled propitiately. He had a temper, but flattered himself that its existence was concealed alike from friends and foes. He had certainly been careful not to betray it, above all to Bake.

"Gracious—never forget the day I hid his umbrella, though! It was pouring, and he had to take his girl to the Staten Island Ferry. I stuck the umbrella up under Billings' overcoat in the closet. Old Billings he went in and found it after Lanse was gone. Tell you, next morning I had to dodge. Soon as ever I came in, Lanse, he hollered, 'Baker, I'm going to break your blamed young neck'—only he said worse than blamed, you bet."

Eda looked over at Lansing in reproachful astonishment, and then turned her eyes, full of tender sympathy, on the young ruffian, who lay back calmly on his pillow, looking like a cherub and manufacturing wholesale lies.

"That's not so, Harry;," said poor Lansing, helplessly. "You know it isn't. Miss Eda, I hope you don't believe—"

"Oh, you ain't going to own up to it," said Bake, with tolerance. "Catch you! I don't care though as long as my neck's all right."

"I didn't say it," protested Lansing, with futile eagerness, but even while he spoke Eda rose quietly, and, with a sadly serious "Excuse me," left the room.

"See here, Bake, that isn't right—it isn't fair. You know I never use such language. What will your sister think?"

"It was fun to make her look like that," said Bake with a smile of real enjoyment. "She thinks you're a nice man."

"But you did not tell the truth. You gave her the wrong impression."

Lansing said nothing. His life stood still. He was looking down at the red and black squares on the checker-board, and feeling that he would probably never care to do anything else again. Of course there must be something he ought to say, in reply to this announcement. Eda was engaged. Eda was an acquaintance of his—almost a friend—but Lansing said nothing. He felt that if he spoke at all, he could only gasp forth; "Bake, I shall die. If Eda marries any one else I shall die."

Bake did not seem to note the fact of his silence. He yawned and continued: "Her fellow's coming next week. He lives in Boston. I guess they'll be married, then. It won't be her fault, if they ain't."

"She is fond of him?" Lansing managed to say. The words felt like cast-iron, as they dropped from his lips.

"Oh, is she? You ought to see her hang around his neck. (His listener started up as if he had been stung.) "Say, if Stiffy Bates comes around asking for me you just tell him—going now?" Lansing was reaching wildly for his hat. "It ain't 9 o'clock. Oh, look here, don't go yet."

"I must," said Lansing quickly, and he spoke the truth. He shook Bake's hand and stared a moment wretchedly at the bright, indifferent face, with its strange sweet likeness to that other face on which he must not look again, and went out from Paradise with an aching heart.

"Say, Phillips, when are you coming up? Mother thinks you're mean. She says you ought to come and see them sometimes."

Since his recovery Bake had been aggressively frendly as well as oppressively impudent to Mr. Phillipps, while the forlorn meekness of that gentlemen's demeanor had been a source of unending comment among his fellow suffers in the latter case.

"If you want to see Eda you will have to come soon. She'll be gone next week, sure pop."

"That so?" asked Lansing, lightly, smiling as a victim on the rack might smile.

"Yes; she's off, settled and done for. Say, if you come this week, don't come Thursday—I won't be home, and mother won't either."

"Nor Eda?"

"Oh, Eda; she's most always home. She has to be, now."

No more was said, Bake's attention being suddenly diverted to a cat on an adjoining roof.

But when Thursday evening came it found Mr. Phillips' mind set to a firm purpose. At eight oclock he had rung the doorbell of Bake's abode and was shaking hands with Eda.

"I am all alone," she explained to him at once, and it actually seemed as if she expected the statement to deter him from entering. It appeared to strengthen him in the contrary course, however, and he followed her, with much determination, in the cozy parlor where he had seen her at work so often.

She looked pale a little, but kind and pretty, and very, very bright.

Lansing could never tell what they talked about for the first few moments, but from the time he rose and crossed the room and sat down by her on the little lounge he remembered everything.

"Eda" he said, quickly, "I came to congratulate you, but I can't; not as I ought to. I wish and hope you may be happy—only—well—you know dear, don't you, that I loved you? Yes; and it is hard to wish you happy with some one else!" He had both her hands by this time. "I felt that I must come and tell you, and say—and—say and good by."

"Good by," she repeated slowly, looking at him with earnest eyes. "What for? Are you going away?"

"I am not going away." Emphasis on the pronoun.

"Well, surely, I am not."

"No!" surprisedly. "Your brother said that after your marriage——"

"What?"

"That after your marriage you would not live here any more."

"My marriage? I don't understand you, Mr. Phillips." She looked both proud and hurt.

"Bake—Harry told me," he faltered. "Perhaps you did not wish it known? He told me you were to be married next week."

"Isn't he a mischief!" she said with gentle deprecation, but blushing beautifully. "The idea! Married!"

"It isn't true?"

"True? Of course not. I should think you would know Harry's fun by this time."

"And you're not engaged?"

"Oh, Eda, Eda! I can't believe it. Are you free? May I tell you how I love you?"

But indeed it did not take much telling. No very lavish outlay of words is needed when hands clasps hands and young eyes are meeting with love's story in their depths.

"And that young a—a—that—Harry! Oh, Eda, if you could know how miserable I have been!"

"I know how miserable I've been. But of course, we won't blame him; he would not willingly make any one suffer. He is such a darling!"

"Well he is," said Lansing, promptly stifling his conscience like a man and a lover, but thinking meanwhile what delight it would give him to soundly beat the darling in question.

"I am so glad you love him," she murmured, gratefully. "Of course he is mischievous, a little—but no one can be perfect! Why, he told me from the first that you were engaged. Yes, and described the young lady. And somehow it never occurred to me to doubt him, so of course——"

"Oh, Eda."

"Yes, I was terribly cold to you. I could not be otherwise, but all the same, I had remembered you from that day we met on the crossing in Broadway——"

"Oh, did you recognize me, Eda? Did you, dearest?"

"Oh! did I?" was the stifled reply from the neighborhood of Lansing's coat collar. And Lansing again said "Eda," which seemed to be the only really satisfactoriiy word in his vocabulary just then.

Eda and Lansing are married, but the mystery of Bake remains a mystery still, and has been indeed further augmented by his promotion, in the most groundless manner, to a position of higher trust and responsibility. He simply ignores the duties incumbent on this advancement, as has been his habit to ignore all other duties, and remarks carelessly when some faint murmur of disapproval from his chief happens to reach his ear, "Oh, what's the matter with him? Who cares?"

MADELINE S. BRIDGES.

A Girl's Invention.

In a remote but decent part of Boston, says the Herald, has lived for about fifteen years an English family of rather unique interest. The father served in the war of the rebellion, and, being a partial invalid in consequence, receives a small pension, which does not go far toward supporting a family, and he can do little besides draw his pension and suffer his constant pain. The mother is a small woman with large brown eyes and pale cheeks. She has had a toilsome life, indeed, and has done all sorts of work to eke out the family support. Two daughters, the elder somewhat noted in the neighborhood as a beauty, and a small boy make up the balance of the household. Although desperately poor, the family have been as proud as Lucifer and seemed bound to accept no more charity than was absolutely unavoidable, though there are plenty of well-to-do people around them who would gladly have contributed in their aid, as every member of the family commanded respect. They have come to be known even outside their narrow circle from their constant efforts to better themselves, trying now this thing and now that. Everything failed until a short time ago; but at last the family has struck something that will give them ease and comfort if not comparative wealth. The handsome daughter is credited with the discovery which is simply a new method of treating photographs in reproduction. Her name has been given to it and her work is getting more and more circulation every day, with, of course, an increased inflow of dollars to the family treasury. She has secured a patent on her process, All the photographers are puzzled by the work and would like to have it for use in their business, as they see that this girl is getting as many orders as she can fill at the good price of $2 for each cabinet reproduction. The pictures are the same size as the original cabinet photographs, but softer and more pleasing in tone, and are mounted under thick plate-glass with beveled edges. How she makes her copies nobody has been able to find out as yet, but in the slang of the day her work "goes."

Eighteen memorials were sent into the United Presbyterian assembly at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, against the confirmation of ministerial candidates who use tobacco.

A FREAK OF AGES.

When I was eight and she was ten,
How proud those two years made her;
She told the difference loud and oft,
No audience delayed her.

And still she gloried in her years—
And called me "Little Boy,"
When she was sixteen, fourteen I—
To me life's one alloy.

When I away to college hied,
Her airs were still maternal;
Her letters teemed with good advice
To her "young friend, fraternal."

At twenty-one I sought the maid,
(My heart was fast consuming),
And told my love; she scorned my suit—
"So young, and so presuming."

To heal my wounds I roamed abroad;
And time my woes did leaven.

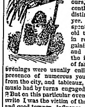
I'm married now, and forty-four;
Miss Nancy's—twenty-seven.

ARISTINE ANDERSON.

STORY OF A PORTRAIT;

Or, How Circumstances Make the Man or Woman.



THE holidays found us, a gay company of young ladies, guests at the hospitable home of a friend of ours, who had recently married a distinguished lawyer. Our days were spent in talking over old times together, in reading, and in gaining new ideas and experience in the important field of fancy work. Our evenings were usually enlivened by the presence of numerous young gentlemen from the city, and tableaux, charades and music had by turns engaged our attention. But on this particular evening of which I write I was the victim of that foe to beauty and good temper, influenza, so I had persuaded my young friends to go to a party, to which we had been invited, without me. Every thing had been done for my comfort, and I was cozily ensconsed in a large easy chair, in front of the library fire. My host had been reading to his wife and me, and I think I must have been dozing, for when he stopped I suddenly jumped up and exclaimed in the prim style of my childhood: "Yes, ma'am." Mrs. Ralston run to me, and said: "What are you talking about, Jean."

"I thought that lady spoke to me," I said, rubbing my eyes and joining in the laugh at my expense, as I pointed to the portrait of a handsome lady, hanging over the mantle. I had often noticed it. The face was handsome, not beautiful, the eyes were black and piercing, the mouth and chin showed decision, while the splendidly-shaped head and high forehead denoted intellect of no mean order. Her abundant hair was dressed high, and profusely powdered. She wore a scarlet satin robe with an immense train, open over a white satin petticoat. The waist was filled in with lace, the sleeves were short with large puffs, while long, white silk mits covered her hands and arms.

The figure was tall and well developed, the position was dignified and graceful. You felt that here was a woman born to command, and with ability to do it wisely, too.

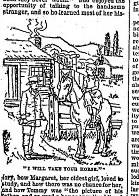
"Oh," said Mr. Ralston, "my stately ancestress summoned you, did she! She is a regular aristocrat, isn't she?"

"Yes," I replied, enthusiastically; "she looks like a born Queen. Please tell me about her."

"Well," he said, "I will tell you the story as I have heard my grandfather tell it. His father was a circuit judge in Western Pennsylvania, and at the time of which I speak was about thirty-five years old, and very handsome, of course. His duties led him to travel through his district, and at that day he journeyed on horseback. On one of these jaunts he found himself in a lonely spot in the mountains, and as both he and his horse were tired and hungry, he was glad to see in the distance a small farm-house. Putting spurs to his horse, he soon reached the fence opposite the door. The sound of his approach drew the family to the door; so he politely accosted the mother and asked if he could get some refreshment for himself and horse. She agreed, and a tall, lithe girl of about fifteen darted out and, resting her hands lightly on the fence, vaulted over it, and, as he had dismounted, she, with an alertness which amazed him, leaped into the saddle, and saying: "I will take your horse to the stable and feed him, sir," rode off.

He conversed with the woman, and found her a shrewd, sensible person, though uncultured. That they were poor, he could see for himself.

The father, he learned, was not strong, but did his best to support his family, and, as the woman proudly said, "they had neither starved or begged, and she reckoned they never would." She enjoyed the opportunity of talking to the handsome stranger, and so he learned most of her history, how Margaret, her oldest girl, loved to study, and how there was no chance for her, and how Tommy was "the picture of his father, and as good a boy as ever lived," and about the twins, etc., etc.



"I WILL TAKE YOUR HORSE."

The judge skillfully included the black-eyed Margaret in the conversation, and was delighted with her wit and intelligence. He left her a book which he had in a pocket, and after awhile resumed his journey.

But the memory of that bright girl lingered with him. She ought to be educated, he thought.

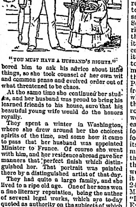
"My, what a woman she would make, such a figure, too, how she leaped that fence; what a pity she shouldn't have a chance to develop that intellect. I've a notion to help her."

Now, the judge, an eccentric man, had no one to consider but himself, and cared not a rush for public opinion. So it came to pass that he stopped at the little farmhouse several times, each time bringing some literary food to the eager girl, who so enjoyed it. On one of these visits he said to the mother: "Your daughter ought to be educated; give her to me, and I will send her to school and give her every advantage of culture, and then," he added, "I will marry her." The mother said: "If you take my child from my protection to yours, you must have a husband's right, or I will not let her go with you."

After some talk the judge agreed; the girl was already in love with him, so the nearest minister was sent for and they were married.

"Now, Judge Ralston," said her mother, "she is your wife, and you have a right to clothe and educate her."

So he took her to Philadelphia to a friend of his, and asked her to order a suitable school outfit, and then he took her to a celebrated boarding-school, and she was instructed as a young lady, and he was supposed to be her guardian. Her progress was wonderful. At the close of that period the judge took her home as his wife, and their marriage was made public. He went to housekeeping in his native city, and was surprised at the ease and grace with which his wife presided over his elegant establishment. He soon found that her executive ability greatly exceeded his own and so resigned all financial matters to her. She found his affairs needed attention, for the judge was very careless about money matters, and she soon found that it bored him to ask his advice about little things, so she took counsel of her own wit and common sense and evolved order out of what threatened to be chaos.



"YOU MUST HAVE A HUSBAND'S RIGHTS."

At the same time she continued her studies, and her husband was proud to bring his learned friends to his house, sure that his beautiful young wife would do the honors royally.

They spent a winter in Washington, where she drew around her the choicest spirits of the time, and some how it came to pass that her husband was appointed Minister to France. Of course she went with him, and her residence abroad gave her manners that perfect finish which distinguished her. That portrait was painted there by a distinguished artist of that day.

They had quite a large family, and she lived to a ripe old age. One of her sons won a fine literary reputation, being the author of several legal works, which are to-day quoted as authority on the subjects of which they treat.

With the exception of the years she spent abroad, she made annual visits to her old home, and very materially improved the condition of affairs there, though she would not allow her husband to do as much for the family as he in his careless generosity would have done. Her brothers were assisted so far as to help them to become independent in their own sphere, not lifted above it, for as the mother grimly remarked: "Judge Ralston married Margaret, not the whole family."

She was a faithful wife and nurse to her husband, who died some years before she did. He often said she was the builder of his fortune as well as the joy of his life. At his death he left her the sole executor of his large estate, and when she died it was found that her affairs were in perfect order, and her will bequeated the property so justly that none of the heirs could complain. This is only another illustration of how circumstances make the man or woman.

"I fear," added Mr. Ralston, "that I have wearied you with my long story." I eagerly disclaimed all fatigue, and after thanking Mr. Ralston for the pleasure he had given me, I returned to my room to think and dream over the tale I had heard, and to wonder if Mr. Ralston's younger brother had inherited any of the traits of character which distinguished his ancestors, for I privately confess some interest in said brother.

MRS. L. B. LAVELY.

FLOWERS AND BIRDS.

They Take the Places of Friends with Busy Working-Girls.

"What class of persons are your best customers?" asked a reporter for the New York Mail and Express of a bird fancier recently.

"Shop girls, seamstresses, milliners and other working women," was his unexpected reply. "Rich folks buy the parrots, educated canaries, the rare foreign birds and the expensive aquaria, but the pretty working-girls are the best and steadiest buyers of the common varieties, and without their custom we should fare badly. We are one with the florists in that respect."

"How do you mean?"

"Well, just you ask the florists—I mean the cheap sidewalk florists of the market and street corners—who are their best customers, and you will get the same answer that I have given you. I can't understand it, either."

"These pets and flowers," said a modest working-girl to the reporter a half-hour later, "they cheer us and we should feel lost without them. Why, we can almost always tell when one of our companions is going wrong, that is, coming home late, becoming bold and gay, and entertaining longings for dress and ornaments, by her giving away her pets and plants or neglecting them."

The canary is by long odds the favorite pet with working-girls. The little sky-blue nonpareil birds, as they are called, love birds, Java sparrows and others are well represented. Guinea pigs and white mice also occasionally receive their share of fostering attention in these humble homes. As to flowers, the hardier, cheaper and prettier of pot plants are the most popular. The geranium is the most common; then comes the heliotrope, then the fuschia, and they also cultivate the wall-flower, the primrose, several varieties of the pink, the oxalis or wood sorrel and whatever will thrive in circumscribed quarters with limited care. The working-girls are often put to their ingenuity to have their pets and flowers attended to during their absence from home in the pursuit of their vocation, especially in cold weather, when the more delicate specimens are apt to suffer severely in the lofty, unwarmed tenements if not cared for. Sometimes one who is too ill to seek her daily work, but able to be about within doors, will minister to the wants of a dozen or more of such possessions on behalf of companions lodging in the same house. Sometimes a kind-hearted landlady will volunteer similar offices for a trifling reciprocation in the way of stitching, mending or of some cheap but pretty worsted or cardboard ornaments for her vacant walls.

SERVED HIM RIGHT.

How a Girl Punished Her Brother for Being Too Fresh.

A funny thing happened on Chestnut street the other day, says the Philadelphia Times. A handsomely-dressed young lady was walking along rather hurriedly below Tenth street. Through the coil of hair on the back of her head was carelessly thrust a very pretty minature dagger made of silver, one of the present fashions of her sex.

Behind the lady walked a young man whose eyes rested upon the dagger from time to time. As they approached Ninth street the young man stepped quickly up and drew the dagger from the lady's hair, and she did not notice it, but a policeman did, and his brawny hand came down upon the young man's shoulder just as he was putting the dagger in his pocket.

"Oh, it's all right," said he; "she's my sister."

"I'll ask her," replied the officer, and he hurried after the young lady, the young man after him. Having overtaken her, the youth explained the matter and asked his sister to tell the officer what a stupid mistake he had made. The lady appeared for a moment to be a little bewildered, then in a freezing tone said: "I don't know him officer; arrest him!"

The dagger having been returned to her, she walked quickly down the street, while the officer conducted the young man by way of Hanson street to the station. An hour later he was released, when there was a big laugh all around at the neat manner in which the sister had turned the joke on the brother, in which laugh, however, the brother did not join.

English Railway Speed.

The famous "Flying Scotchman" goes to York (188 miles) in 3 hours 55 minutes, or at the rate of exactly 48 miles an hour. The Scotchman is timed to pass Doncaster (156 miles) 3 hours 15 minutes after leaving King's Cross; the 1:30 P. M. Leeds train draws up at the platform in 3 hours 4 minutes. From Doncaster to Leeds is only 29 1-2 miles; but the gradients are heavy for a large part of the distance, the line is a network of junctions and crossings and sidings, and there are stops both at Wakefield and at Holbeck, so that to reach Leeds in 3 hours 55 minutes is really a far finer performance than to run along the flat valley of the Ouse to York, 2 1-2 miles further, in the same time. But to Leeds and to Scotland the Great Northern has its rivals well in hand. It is undeniably the shortest and quickest route, and it has no great motive for further acceleration. To Manchester, however, it is another matter. From Euston to Manchester is only 189 miles, (by the road some of the trains take through the Potteries it is 6 miles horter still;) from St. Pancrass, it is only 19 1-4; while from King's Cross it is no less than 203. Moreover, if the Midland route is somewhat harder, the Northwestern is undoubtedly a great deal easier. For the Great Northern therefore to hold its own against the flying four-and-a-quarter hour expresses of its two rivals means simply that it must run three miles an honr faster than what are almost, if not quite, the fastest series of trains in the world. And it does it; but only once, it must be confessed, each way in the 24 hours. To say that it reaches Manchester in the same time that the "Dutchman" and the "Zulu" take to Exeter, nine miles nearer, is only to give a faint idea of the speed. For while the Great Western runs along an almost dead flat, the road from Sheffield to Manchester is 20 miles up one side of the roof of a house, immediately followed by a second 20 miles down the other, and on this part of the road very high speed is, of course, impossible. Accordingly, while the "Flying Scotchman" takes 2 hours and 10 minutes over the 105-1-2 miles between Grantham and London, and the fastest of the Leeds trains only 2 minutes less, the 2 P. M. ex-Manchester does the distance in 3 minutes under the 2 hours, or at the rate of a fraction over 54 miles an hour. The "Dutchman," which long held the palm as the fastest train in the world, only averages 53 1-5 even as far as Swindon.—The Nineteenth Century.

Which Path to Choose.

From Youths' Companion.

In 1839 a middle-aged man was incarcerated in the debtor's prison in Philadelphia. He was a grave, silent man, with marked features and grizzled hair; he spent his whole time at work with a miniature furnace, retorts and chemicals, and was so absorbed in his work that he sometimes forgot to eat. He had been a partner in a hardware firm which had failed, and the jailer explained to visitors that the failure had affected his reason. For nine years he had given himself up wholly to experimenting with the sap of the Indian-rubber tree, trying to make a substance, which would neither melt in summer nor crack in winter.

His friends paid his debts, and he left the jail and took his wife and children to a village in Connecticut. There he remained for years in the direst poverty, often to the point of lacking food, but never for an hour turning aside from his work. His own money and all that he could borrow from friends or strangers went into his experiments. His child died, and as he had not a dollar with which to bury it, he went on foot to the cemetery, carrying the little coffin, and laid the baby to rest with his own hands. At last came success. He gave to the world vulcanized rubber, a substance invaluable to art and science, and also to every day practical life, and founded a great fortune.

Not far from Charles Goodyear, in the days of his struggles, lived a young artist as poor as he. He, too, gave himself to his work with absolute faith and fiery zeal. The sketches which he made at that time prove that he had exceptional power, but he, also, had a wife and children. If he gave himself to the study of the highest art, they must starve. He choose rather to feed, clothe and educate them well. He abandoned his hope and ambition and the work for which God had fitted him, and painted inferior popular pictures which brought him in a comfortable income. When he died, he left behind him a family of commonplace men and women, well-to-do and happy; but the note which had been given him to strike in the great human orchestra never had been sounded.

Now which of those men was true to his duty? This is one of the riddles of life which come before many a young man to whom has been given ability for a special, noble work. Shall he sell his birth-right for a mess of pottage, even for his children?

"Be true to your art," said Guido, "and let the world sink."

"Know your own bone," wrote Emerson. "Gnaw at it alone, bury it, unearth it, but gnaw it still."

Popular Conversation Parties.

It is astonishing how difficult it is for a party of fifty, we will say, to talk well. They sit, these fifty people full of ideas, and stare in each others faces if they have met to talk. But get them into a crowded room, and how every tongue is limbered! Let some one play a piano forte solo, and the effect is equally good; everybody wishes to talk. There has been a great effort made recently for popular conversation parties. Several clubs have private meetings at the houses of members for familiar talk. A number of ladies' clubs have attempted it. but the result is utter silence. All afraid of their own voices. There are one or two imperical remedies, however. If at "homes" and at evening receptions the aids to conversation are not prolific or heart inspiring, if there is no ready made topic at command, it is not a bad thing to throw an explosive conversational shell in the middle of the floor. The powders of talk are often thus unloosed. A startlingly clever observation might be quoted, or a question of such a character that it will shock no prejudice. These are the imperical remedies.—Harper's Bazar.

Com'r Bergdahl reported that the bridge built in Sletten was satisfactorily done and recommended that the amount appropriated to said township be paid. On motion the report was approved and adopted.

The personal property taxes of Mary Anderson, of Sand Hill township, and Ephriam Brush, of Crookston, were cancelled on account of a double assessment in each case.

The delinquent road taxes of M. E. Kirsch on his farm in Belgium township were abated for the reason that said tax has been worked out in the town.

The sum of $300 was appropriated out of the 5th district road and bridge fund to Huntsville township for grading and culverts west of Red Lake River, and the sum of $150 to said township for a bridge across the Marais, between sections 13 and 14, in said town.

The committee on petition of H. Dunlava and Levi S. Myers and others for a county road, presented their report and the board considered the prayer of said petitioners, and on motion the said petition was granted and the Auditor was directed to notify the supervisors of the several towns through which said road passes of the action of this board.

The petition of J. A. Henry was presented and a hearing set at the next meeting of the board.

A correction was ordered in the assessment of lots 26 and 27, block 1, Jerome's addition to Crookston, by striking out amount added for improvements, there being none on said lots, and also to the north half of lot 18, block 2, Fisher.

The sum of five dollars per month was allowed Mrs. Melina Penier of Red Lake Falls.

The sw¼ of tp. 150, range 46, was attached to school district number 173.

A petition for a change in the Sand Hill road was presented and a committee was appointed consisting of com'rs Bergdahl, Hunt and Kirsch to examine the proposed change—said committee to meet at the village of Fertile at noon on the 9th day of July next.

The Auditor was directed to advertise for bids from county physicians for attending to paupers.

Poor aid to the amount of fifty dollars was allowed Chris Carleson to be paid to Dr. Dunlop for medical services.

John McLaughlin and wife $8;—Kramer $5; Mrs. Falk $5.

The account of A. Lizette for road work done in Lowell was rejected, the expenditure being unauthorized.

The following appropriations were made out of the 1st district road and bridge fund:

To Garfield	township	$150
" Rosebud	"	125
" Knute	"	60
" "	"	40
" Brandswold	"	30
" Winger	"	75

The com'r of the 3d district reported that the repairs on the county bridge, five miles east of Crookston would soon be completed, and recommended that provision be made for paying the contractor, and on motion the Auditor was directed to pay for said work on receipt of a certificate from com'rs Thompson and Kirsch showing the repairs to be completed according to contract.

The sum of two thousand dollars, or as much thereof as may be necessary, was ordered transferred from the revenue to the special revenue fund for the purpose of paying jurors, witnesses and other court expenses at the coming term of court.

The Auditor was directed to pay the sum of one hundred and forty dollars to the several insurance agents, being the premium on the insurance on court house and jail.

The sum of one hundred and seventy-five dollars was appropriated out of the 3d district road and bridge fund to aid in grading and putting in culverts on the county road on the town line between Fairfax and Crookston townships, along the north line sec. 4, Fairfax.

The minutes of January, February and March sessions 1888 were read and approved.

The Writer for June.

The June number of The Writer (Boston) is bright and full of interest. The work of the Washington correspondent is fully described by Herbert S. Underwood, one of the most able of the correspondents at the capital "Shorthand Writing and Its Advantages" is discussed in a brilliant and sensible article by James W. Clarke, who gives some invaluable advice to young shorthand writers. Richard E. Burton has a sharp article on "Slovenliness in Verse Making," and James Newton Matthews discloses "One Secret of Writing Popular Poetry." The article in the May number of the magazine criticising the English of Miss Amelie Rives is answered in the present number by Marion M. Horsfield, who makes a spirited reply to the critic of the young Virginia writer. Eugene L. Didier has an article in which he asserts that New York is neither the place to make money by literary work, nor the place to do literary work in, and E. F. Burns discusses the necessity of having "Something to Tell." The answers to "Queries," the "Helpful Hints," and the reference list of "Literary Articles in Periodicals" are as valuable as usual. The Writer has reached a regular circulation of 7,000 copies monthly, and merits all the success that it has gained. The price is one dollar a year, or ten cents a sample copy. Address: The Writer, P. O. Box 1905, Boston, Mass.

Farmers, remember this is a progressive age, and the barb wire that was first introduced with a fair success is now looked upon as a thing of the past. It was good in its day, but like other things, its days of usefulness are numbered with the past. Buy the Baker barbed wire, for sale by Ortonville Herald: J. B. Douglass, a Brainerd attorney, was in town Tuesday, engineering a Kindred boom for congress. He secured the names of the delegates to the St. Cloud convention and said he must "see" them. Something remarkable may happen at St. Cloud on June 12th.

New York or Indiana.

St. Paul Dispatch.

In 1884 the republican party made the inexcusable blunder of concentrating all its forces in the state of New York, with a view to the recovery of that state from the democrats, who had demonstrated in every presidential and gubernatorial election since 1874 that they had a clear majority of the votes behind them. Samuel J. Tilden had been elected governor; and two years later had secured the vote of New York in the electorial college; the joint vote of Kelly and Robinson in 1879, the opposing candidates for governor, far exceed that by which Gov. Cornell had been elected, and Cleveland in 1881 had been elected governor by an extraordinary majority. All this, however, did not deter the republicans from making New York the presidential battle ground in 1884. New Jersey, Connecticut and Indiana, in all of which better prospects of success were presented, were let go by default, and gave their votes respectively to the democratic candidates.

Since 1884 New York has gone democratic by increased majorities, giving Gov. Hill a plurality of 11,124 in 1885 and the democratic candidate for judge of the court of appeals in 1886 a plurality of 7,818. Indiana, on the other hand, has held one state election since 1884, which resulted in a republican plurality of 3,324. This latter election was held in 1886.

The question now arises whether the republican national convention will decide to make New York the determining factor in the presidential election. If it does it will choose its candidate from the Eastern states and will depend upon Eastern men and Eastern influences for his election. If not, it will wisely come to the West and select an upright and able statesman, distinguished by the cleanliness of his record and the dignity and elevation of his political ideals—a friend to civil service reform and of the American protective principle, a just judge, a brave soldier and an honorable man. Indiana is now a republican state, and will remain republican with its own candidate in the field. New York is democratic, and will doubtless remain democratic with its own candidate in the field.

There are but three weeks remaining during which the decision of this question must be made. Upon that decision will largely turn the hopes of the republican party.

Going West.

The general interest that has been taken in the opening of the Montana Indian Reservations is shown by the large numbers of people who have already gone to Great Falls to investigate the mineral and agricultural resources of that wonderful country. The low excursion rate announced by C. H. Warren, Gen. Pass. Agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, makes the expense of exploring this country merely nominal, and will undoubtedly result in a still larger number following. [4-11]

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Our old customers always recommend their neighbors to us.

STEENERSON & McMANUS.

But very few people are aware of the amount of adulteration there is in the different lines of food products. Sugars, jellies, butter and cheese are all liable to adulteration when brought from eastern markets. When in want of a pure article of cheese, call on Hartshorn, Hurlbut & Co. or B. Clements and ask for Hallock cheese which is warranted absolutely pure and full cream stock. By so doing you secure a good article while you encourage home manufacture.

Elias Steenerson has engaged desk room with Christianson Bros., and is now prepared to write insurance in the old reliable Continental Company. This company will insure against losses by fire lightning and cyclones. Mr. Steenerson is the only agent for this old reliable company in Polk and Norman counties and if any other should attempt to represent this company set him down as an impostor and do not deal. The Hallock Cheese Factory.

This institution, owned and managed by McCollum & Suffel, entered upon its third season last week. Owing to a lack of rain grass has not started sufficient to afford good feed, which is a drawback to cheese-factories and creameries. The building is 24x60 feet, located upon sloping ground, which admits of a store room beneath, which is cool in summer and warm in winter. Adjoining the main building on the east is a shed wherein is located the engine and boiler. The institution has one vat, and presses sufficient, and can now manufacture the milk of 500 cows; by the addition of another vat they could handle double the amount. The presses are of the latest improved style of screw press. The drying room has facilities for handling the whole product conveniently and well. W. L. Beaton, who was formerly a resident of Oxford, Ont., and who, for a long time, made cheese specially for the best Liverpool trade, has charge of the factory, and the samples we have seen bear ample testimony to his skill and experience. The factory sends its own teams around and gathers the milk, so that all the farmer has to do is to "wait for the wagon" every day except Sunday, and rake in his cash every thirty days. The first season proved a financial loss to the firm of over $600, owing to lack of cows and confidence, but instead of throwing up the whole thing in disgust, as many would have done, McCollum & Suffel, recognizing that it would be a grand thing for their county if farmers would only take an interest in it, determined to keep right on and try to build up a good trade. Last year they made cheese from about 300 cows during the season of 20 weeks, and when the product is all disposed of will have paid expenses for that year. They aim to pay the farmer every cent the business will allow for their milk, but even on this plan some of their patrons before now have been disposed to grumble, because they do not get more, forgetting the fact that if the patrons would furnish a supply of milk equal to the running capacity of the factory, there would be more money in it for all interested. At the prices paid, a cow that gives 15 quarts of milk per day when fresh, will average $25 for the season, and the farmer has his Sunday's milk besides with which to supply his table with butter. This is on a basis of about 30 lbs. per day, not quite half what a good Holstein cow would do, and shows two things plainly: 1st, that it pays the farmer better than anything he can do with his cows as they are, and, 2d, that it would pay him a handsome thing to have the right kind of cows for the business. Moreover, with the factory running to its utmost capacity he would get more for his milk than he does now, which would be no small thing in itself considered. After the expense is paid every cent gained is clear profit. It requires just as much care and labor to winter a cow that will give from 20 to 30 lbs. of milk per day as is does one that will double that and more, and just as much feed. The cow is simply a machine for converting grass and grain into butter and cheese, and the better the machine the more profit there is in it. This factory makes nothing but the full cream cheese, and being made by a man who has had a life long experience in the business, is very liable to and does turn out a better quality of cheese than nine-tenths of the cheese that is sent in from below. It MAY possibly be all right in some cases, full-cream and lacking the new oleo-margarine mixture that sometimes gets into cheese now-a-days, but then again, it may not, and the customer has to take his chances on that. The Halleck cheese is a home production, known to be in every case just what it is said to be, a full-cream production. We are pleased to see that Messrs. Suffel & McCollom are meeting with a good home trade and it is no more than they deserve, for home enterprises of this kind always should have the preference over foreign. In this case the patron of home industry is the gainer, as he has the undoubted assurance that the goods he buys are absolutely pure and as represented, full-cream, something which cannot be said for every institution, for, where the cheese is not adulterated shamefully it is liable to be skimmed or, in other words robbed of much of its cream.

The above are but a few of the records made by animals of the "Reliance Herd." Very many others as good and better than these are being made, but are as yet unfinished. The herd still holds its place as the largest and choicest herd of Holstein-Friesians in the entire West. At head of herd are two bulls which for choice individuality and deep milk and butter breeding are not surpassed in America.

Netherland Carl, dam Carlotte, with butter record of 22 lbs. 1¼ oz. in week, sire Netherland Prince, who is the sire of five cows with average butter records of 16 lbs. 5¼ oz.

Isinours, Fillmore Co., Minn., April 1, 1888. JERE ALLIS.

Mr. Lindall is building a fine little cottage next door to Veterinary Surgeon Leguee's. That street is picking up; will soon be one of the prettiest in the city.

M. E. Bartlett lost a valuable Holstein-Friesian cow on Wednesday night. The animal was apparently in good health on Wednesday evening and was found dead in the morning. Mike Leguee made a postmortem examination and pronounced the trouble to be consumption.

Judge Ives and Ed. Wile have been fixing up the grounds around their respective residences and if they can manage to get in about 15 or 20 minutes fine weather this summer will soon have fine grassy lawns to delight the eye. While you come to think of it the residences along that row show evidences of great care and taste well bestowed.

The prompt action of the State of Florida in deciding to make an elaborate exhibit at the Exposition at Minneapolis this season has brought California and Alabama to the front and they announce that they will be on hand with a complete exhibit of their resources and products. The wonderful development of the iron and coal of Alabama and the great increase of the fruit growing industries of California present many features of interest to the public and a collection showing what has been done in a manner at once graphic and complete can not fail to be very interesting.

Warren Register: In the case of Swanberg vs. the Railroad Company, Messrs. Grindland and Steenerson won a victory that they may well be proud of. The Railroad Company was represented by very able counsel in the trial, and had the plaintiff's side of the case been handled by less competent counsel than it was, the result might have been different. All the legal gentleman engaged in the trial of the case, made able and eloquent addresses before the jury. $15,000 is a heap of money, in the eyes of a poor newspaper man, and enough to tempt him to wish himself in Swanberg's place, or that of his attorneys.

Douglas County News: Mr. Geo. H. Reynolds spent Sunday with Alexandria friends, having returned from Denver last week where he left Mrs. Reynolds. Mrs. R. has gradually gained in health since going to Denver and her friends have strong hopes of her ultimate recovery.

Co-operative Creameries.

Western Rural And American Stockman.

John Boyd writes us that co-operative creameries are growing in popular estimation and are bound to be the thing. We believe it. The tendency among producers is to co-operate as far as possible, and there is no branch of agricultural production in which co-operation is more feasible and more readily adopted. A co-operative creamery may be backed by a comparatively small area of territory. One of the difficulties in the way of getting farmers together is found in the fact that they are scattered and difficult to reach. But in the dairy business, it will not require much time or travel to see enough farmers to organize a co-operative association and to support it after it is organized. Of course all the profits that a creamery makes comes out of the producer. It is his cream that pays the profit on production—if there is any—pays the proprietor of the creamery his profit, pays the commission man his, and the retailer his. If it is thought to be worth while to save the profits that go into the pockets of the men who run the creamery, co-operation is desirable. There may seem to be one possible difficulty, and that is the inexperience of those who should join in the association. But the practical work is done by a practical man who is hired for the purpose, and farmers know enough to conduct the financial affairs of the concern. Besides there is this encouragement: So far as we know the co-operative creameries have been a great success.

Farm, Stock and Home: A certain farmer of our acquaintance must lose his farm by foreclosure of a mortgage which with all his experience, skill and industry he cannot pay; but he philosophically consoles himself with a published statement he saw the other day, that the nation is growing rich at the rate of two and a half million dollars every day! That satisfies him that everything is all right.

Farm, Stock and Home: Of the thirty-one trusts now in full tide of successful robbery in this country, twenty-five are protected and made possible by the tariff as now constituted, and every one of these could be legislated out of existence in an hour. But it is not likely to be done in all summer. Great is the power of the trust, and very potent is their gold.

A Lumber "Combine."

Some Workings of "Protection" in the West---What Labor Gets Out of it---the People Waking up.

[Correspondence of The Evening Post.]

CHICAGO, May 22.

The Mississippi Logging Company of Rock Island, Ill., a gigantic organization which has for several years aimed to control the lumbering interests of the Mississippi Valley from St. Paul to St. Louis, and which operates sawmills in most of the principal towns along the Mississippi River and its Wisconsin tributaries, has at last succeeded in absorbing its only formidable rival, the Eau Claire Lumber Company of Eau Claire, Wis., and St. Louis Mo., a concern which in former seasons handled about 65,000,000 feet of rafted lumber in its St. Louis yards alone.

There is to-day scarcely a town along the upper Mississippi which is not touched by the influence of the great syndicate whose members are not only the owners of the more important sawmills in St. Paul, Red Wing, Winona, Minn.; Eau Claire and Prairie du Chien, Wis.; McGregor, Dubuque, Clinton, Davenport, Muscatine, Burlington, Fort Madison, Keokuk, Iowa; Rock Island and Quincy, Ill.; Hannibal and St. Louis, Mo., and all the smaller towns situated between the points mentioned; but also control the pine lands as well as all the towing facilities of the various waterways of the Northwestern lumber regions.

Moved solely by the selfish desire to make as much money as possible, the firms composing the Logging Company or "trust" have at no time shown a disposition to treat their employes fairly. The production of lumber has for years been curtailed to suit the treasury of the "combine," and wages have been cut down to such a point that American laborers are compelled to seek employment in other channels.

The sawmills are operated not more than eight months of the year—frequently not for so long—the working hours are eleven hours a day, and the wages—making allowance for wet days when yard work is stopped—average $8. per week for men and $3.50 for boys, or, to use the words of a veteran mill-hand, "by working whenever I get a chance I can make $275 during the season; my boy earns $120 more, and out of that I must support a wife and eight children, who are not yet old enough to do steady work."

It is needless to say that native workmen and naturalized foreigners who do not look upon their wives and children as slaves, whose duty it is to work from morning till night, find it impossible to live upon wages paid by the Lumber Trust, and the natural consequence has been the indirect importation of unskilled and ignorant laborers from Europe, who are content to live in two roomed hovels built on malaria-breeding lots, which in many of the Mississippi River towns have been artificially made by filling in with sawdust low and damp ground located near the mills and yards. The women add to the income by doing odd jobs, and their children are put to work as soon as they are old enough to perform the lightest kind of labor.

It is the boast of high-tariff advocates that no laboring man in this republic will have to suffer from want of wholesome food, clothing, and shelter while "protection" is the accepted policy of the Government, but a study of the condition of the lumber hands in any of the towns mentioned in this letter will prove the fallacy of that statement more clearly than columns of sophistical arguments, while it will also demonstrate that the American workingman and mechanic who is compelled to pay war prices for everything he buys is brought into direct competition with foreigners who, by denying themselves the necessities and luxuries which he produces, are able to save money out of an income which would mean want and suffering to himself and family.

Day, however, is breaking. The intelligent workingmen and farmers of the great Northwest are agitating the tariff question. They are beginning to grow tired of acting as the pack-horses of monopolists and demagogues, and no candidate for legislative honors who is not fairly and squarely in favor of tariff reform will receive their support this fall. They claim—and justly, too that the duty on pine lumber, shingles, clapboards, and other articles manufactured in the Western mills is a tax which goes from their pockets directly into the treasury of the lumber combine, which has never shown a willingness to divide its plunder with its employes.

Excursion Rates.

A very complete list of tourist round trip rates and routes to western points for 1888, has just been issued for free distribution by C. H. Warren, Gen. Pass. Agent, St. P. M. & M. Ry, St. Paul, Minn. [4-9]

A Remarkable Discovery.

Wadena Tribune: It is surprising how quick the Northern Pacific railroad discovered that it could reduce rates one-fourth, after the supreme court had decided that the railroad commission had a right to regulate rates on railroads operating in the state. Last fall the commission served notice upon the N. P. company that it would be well to reduce rates from four to three cents per mile. This the company refused to do, and the commission had notices posted advising passengers to only pay at the rate of three cents per mile. As no one was willing to fight the commissioners' battle, the order was not tested. Recently the supreme court rendered a decision that the board had a right to demand and enforce an order to lower rates where they (the commissioners) thought there was an unjust discrimination. Closely following the decision of the supreme court comes the "voluntary" announcement of the Northern Pacific company that it has reduced passenger rates on all its lines. The public is to be congratulated; as it will make quite a difference to those who may have occasion to use the line.

Mr. Blaine on Foreign Wages.

To the Editor of The Evening Post:

Sir: The new "protection" organ of this city, the Press, has recently published a list of American and English wages, claiming that the American laborer receives $1 per day more than the English laborer, and that the difference in the cost of living is only 17 cents per day. This is copied to some extent in the Republican organs throughout the state.

Any one who has made this subject a study knows how utterly false are the conclusions reached by such newspapers on the question of tariff and wages. But I want to quote from a man whom even the most hide-bound "protectionist" will not accuse of being even tainted with free-trade heresies, James G. Blaine. In Public Document No. 12, October, 1881, 'Commercial Relations of the United States,' on page 98, in submitting to the House of Representatives the reports from the consuls of the United States on cotton manufactures, Secretary of State Blaine in his "Introductory Letter" says the following:

> The wages of spinners and weavers in Lancashire and in Massachusetts, according to the foregoing statements [tables of hours and wages in the cotton mills of both countries], were as follows per week: Spinners, English, $7.20 to $3.40 (master spinners running as high as $12); American, $7.07 to $10.50. Weavers: English, $3.84 to $3.64, subject, at the date on which these rates were given, to a reduction of 10 per cent.; American, $4.82 to $8.73.
>
> The average wages of employes in the Massachusetts mills is as follows, according to the official returns: Men, $8.30; women, $5.62; male children, $3.11; female children, $3.08. According to Consul Shaw's report, the average wages of men employed in the Lancashire mills on the 1st of January, 1880, was about $8 per week, subject to a reduction of 10 per cent.; women from $3.40 to $1.30, subject to a reduction of 10 per cent.
>
> The hours of labor in the Lancashire mills are fifty-six, in the Massachusetts mills sixty per week. The hours of labor in the mills in the other New England States, where the wages are generally less than in Massachusetts, are usually 68 to 69 per week. Undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer hours of labor. If this should prove to be a fact in practice, as it seems to be proven from official statistics, it would be a very important element in the establishment of our ability to compete with England for our share of the cotton-goods trade of the world.

He then goes on to say: "In the two prime factors which may be said to form the basis of the cotton manufacturing industry, namely, raw material and labor, we hold the advantage over England in the first, and stand upon an equality with her in the second."

Once a "Protectionist."

Nothing Better Than Bran.

American Agriculturist: A study of the variations in the character of the wheat crop, and in the composition of the grain grown from year to year in the experimental field of Sir J. B. Fawes, at Rothamsted, England, side with the varying circumstances of root and leaf supply of moisture to the plant, and of temperature, is sufficient to show how numerous, and how indeed ever changing in their mutual relations, are the factors which lead to one or another order of development in the growing wheat plant. It is true that about three-fourths only of the total nitrogen of the grain of wheat are found in ordinary bread-flour, the remaining one-fourth or so, being retained in the usually excluded or branny portions, which latter are always richer in nitrogen than the flour. But it has long been known to agricultural chemists that a considerable part of the nitrogenous matters of the excluded portions of the wheat berry is not of the same assimilabe condition as those which exist in the flour, and it is now acknowledged by those who have given this matter their most serious consideration, that the nitrogenous substances of the bran of wheat are in an inferior degree digestable and available, at least to the human body. How far they may be assimilated and digested in the stomach of an herbivorous animal is still a matter of inquiry. It is acknowledged, however, among dairy farmers that there is no better milk-producing material than bran.—John J. Willis, Superintendent of Lawes and Gilbert's Experimental Farm, Rothamsted, England.

Home--Woman's Realm.

American Agriculturist: Home is the habitat of woman. In the home all that is characteristically feminine in woman unfolds and flourishes. Home without woman is a misnomer, for woman makes the home, and home is what she makes it. If she is illiterate, her home partakes of this quality; if she is immoral, her home cannot be the abode of virtue; if she is coarse, refinement does not dwell where she resides. If she is cultured, pure, refined, these qualities will characterize the home which she creates. The higher the degree of her culture, her purity, her refinement, the more will these qualities characterize the home of which she is center. The self that a woman takes with her in her marriage is her dower. If her dower can be reckoned in numerals only, no matter how many they be, wretched indeed will be her husband, impoverished her children. But if she possess industry, gentleness, self-abnegation, purity, intelligence, combined with capability, she is in herself a treasure of treasures.

Gifts of Poison.

It is time that respectable merchants combined with consumers for the suppression of all gift, prize and lottery schemes in connection with the sale of articles of merchandise. These schemes are not only demoralizing to legitimate business and to the morals of the community, but in the extent in which they are being carried in the sale of articles of food have become a source of great danger to the public health. They are, no matter in what form they appear, nothing more or less than devices to swindle honest and unsuspecting people.

It is gratifying to learn that in some instances the officers of the law have taken hold of the matter. In New York, and also in Chicago, parties who in this way offered gifts to purchasers of their packages have recently been arrested upon indictments for lottery swindling. The latest candidates, both for public execration and criminal prosecution, are the manufacturers of the alum baking powders, who are both, by means of gifts and lottery tickets,, disposing of large quantities of their corrosively poisonous compounds, which are so well known to be detrimental to health that no housekeeper will admit them to her kitchen knowingly. This form of swindle is not only being peddled from house to house, but under the promise of large profits to be realized, the manufacturers are entrenching themselves behind the counters of many grocers by getting them to offer the alum goods with the gifts or lottery tickets attached, thereby shifting the liability to prosecution, in part, upon other, and perhaps innocent parties. Every grocer or dealer, for instance, who sells or offers for sale any of the prize or lottery baking powders is a criminal in the eye of the law, and liable, upon conviction, to fine and imprisonment, while those who sell the gift goods are, morally, as responsible, for they are offering an inducement, or prize, to housekeepers to use a food that contains a corrosive poison. This is a predicament in which it is not possible our grocers will care to place themselves when they come to think seriously of the matter.

It must be borne in mind that every one of these gift or prize baking powders are alum baking powders. These powders cost less than four cents a pound to produce; the gift or prize costs but a few cents more. They are sold at the price of a first-class baking powder, so that the swindle, in a commercial sense, is enormous. But the chief iniquity of the business consists in selling, as presumably wholesome, an article of a positively injurious character, and by the means of gifts or bribes inducing servants or unsuspecting housekeepers to purchase and use it in our daily food.

There should be some prompt method of reaching these dangerous practices and punishing the parties engaged in their promotion. If the present laws are not ample, we commend the matter to the consideration of our State Board of Health for recommendation of such additional legislation as shall be effective for the protection of the public.

The utilization of what is apparently waste material is very interesting in many of its details. The well known article "Featherbone" used for dress stays, corsets, whips and other articles needing an elastic, tough and unbreakable material is the result of a shrewd Yankee's thoughts after seeing an immense quantity of goose and turkey quills wasted in a feather duster factory. The complicated and ingenious machinery by which it is worked up into various articles will be shown in constant operation by a corps of skilled workmen from the factory, at the Minneapolis Exposition which opens August 22d.

Norman J. Coleman.

There are two classes of people in America who are particularly interested in the tariff, they are the manufacturers and the farmers. When the tariff was imposed and made a law it was for the purpose of raising sufficient revenue to pay the current expenses of the government, and to liquidate its debt; still there has always been an incidental protective feature to such laws from the foundation of the government for the reason that interested parties were ever clamorous for that which would benefit themselves regardless of the effect it would have upon the general public. Instance: The quinine duty made so high as to be prohibitory; at whose instance? the manufacturers; for whose benefit? their own. Had the public any interest? Yes, to the extent of paying $4 an ounce for it whilst now with the tax removed it can be bought at 50 cents. Did the government make anything by the transaction? No. Did anybody? Yes; two manufacturers made millions, and every poor ague shaken man in the country, though unable to buy bread for his family because of sickness, was compelled to contribute thereto. Did the imposition of the tariff add to the cost of quinine? Most certainly. Does the imposition of such a tariff add to the cost of everything so taxed? Undoubtedly, and in a vast number of cases it is made for no other reason than that manufacturers might be the gainers thereby.

There is another side to this question however. By imposing a tariff on foreign manufacturers, the home manufacturers are able to sell their goods at higher prices, and to pay their employes higher wages. How much wages do manufacturers pay their employes? Just as much as they possibly can of course. They are always on the outlook to increase their wages, always share there immense profits with them, hence it is that workingmen in this country roll in wealth, abound in luxuries and live in palaces. They could never do these things if they were not paid ninety per cent of the profits made by the protected manufacturers, whilst the latter are living in hovels and dying in poverty, poor fellows. Why some of the manufacturers in America actually pay little boys and girls as much as a dollar a week for their labor, and keep their widowed mothers from starvation by paying them fifty cents a dozen for making shirts, vests, pants and coats. Even the coal miners and iron workers and the employes of every highly protected industry in America are able to earn as much as a dollar and a half or two dollars a day and keep themselves and their families in fine houses on sumptuous fare, send their children to the highest schools, provide them with pianos, clothe them in fine linen and go to Europe or the watering places to spend their summers. These things could not be done but for a protective tariff, hence we have it and glory in it. Oh no, the manufacturers of America differ from those of other countries in the respect that they are ever seeking to increase the wages paid to their employes instead of cutting them down, and that is the reason we never hear of strikes, know nothing of tramps driven out of work and compelled to ramble over the country to become paupers, beggars or thieves to get it.

Nor is this the end of the effects of this great love the highly protected tariff. They pay high wages that their employes may be able to buy of the non-protected farmers the produce of their lands and of their hard and unremitting toil. Hence it is farmers get such high prices for their beef and pork, butter and eggs, wheat and corn, potatoes and cabbage. Why the largest manufacturers in the country are particularly fond of providing their employes with means to pay the farmers high prices for all they produce even to the extent of accompanying their wives to the markets to see that they pay enough for what they buy. They just dote on the farmers and, indeed, but for the interest they manifest in them, the tillers of the soil would be the least protected, hardest worked and the least paid class of the population. As it is we have a great country, and a free, the taxes are very low, every man owns his farm, such a thing as a mortgage is unknown because the farmers get good crops which command high prices and are all sold to the employes of the highly protected manufacturers and never have to be sold in competition with the pauper labor of other countries. The farmer therefore, makes his own prices for his produce just as does the manufacturer, hence has an abundance, enjoys life, lives in luxury, and has pretty nearly as much good of a highly protective tariff as the coal miners, iron workers, shirt makers and the poor of this world generally. People may wonder why this is so, but the solution is at hand. We have enjoyed a hundred years of more or less protection.

Intelligent people of this county have little or no faith in those whose record in the past cast a doubt on all future promises of honesty and fair dealing. This concern has now, by fraud and misrepresentation of all kinds, finally arrived at a point where nothing will save them from ruin, but "last of all," repentance.
C. H. SAAKE.

The genial Sam Ellis, manager of the Fielding troupe made many friends while here who will always remember him with pleasure and welcome him warmly should he ever return to our city. He thinks it is not an impossibility that he may be around again some day even though his first appearance did not pan out as well as he had hoped.

Kittson County is rejoicing in copious shower-baths and reports from there are very encouraging for bounteous crops. They were terribly blue for a time—and well they might be, for no rain has fallen during the spring until last week, and they were in sore need of it. Now the reports are all brighter and the people begin to take an interest in the affairs of life.

Reports from different portions of the county indicate that Polk County will receive her usual average of wheat if if not more. The cool weather so far while not calculated to give wheat a rapid start and a quick growth, has had a beneficial effect by causing it to stool far better than ever and this must result in a much larger crop than ever if nothing intervenes to prevent.

Call at Francis' Photograph Gallery for pictures in every style, picture frames and any and everything you need in this line. The Maggie Fielding Company presented Ranch 10 on Wednesday to a fair house considering the Dickens readings in McKinnon's hall. The troupe fully sustained the favorable impression made on their first appearance and gained admirers. They have an excellent band and orchestra which proves a very attractive feature. They left for Grand Forks on Friday to play that city two nights when they intend to disband for the season.

C. C. Utzinger, A. C. Schmidt and R. Burkhardt represented Crookston Odd Fellows at the Fergus convention last week. C. C. said Fergus was the biggest town he ever saw in the Northwest (last week). Thousands were there every day and the capacity of the city was tested to its utmost to provide accommodations for the vast multitudes, but they were given the freedom of the city and made welcome in right royal style. The boys unite in the statement that Fergus knows how to entertain.

The Grand Army re-union at Fergus last week, though marred somewhat by the untoward storms was a grand success. Big crowds every day and something going on every minute to keep people busy. Many of our most noted men were there among them nearly all of the aspirants for Congressional honors in the Fifth District. The Fergus people were lavish of their wealth in the effort to provide every facility for enjoyment and, apparently, everybody enjoyed the event hugely.

In 2:15, on Thursday evening, the Maggie Fielding company showed some of their powers of acting, though the audience was not such as to inspire the loftiest flights of genius. In our opinion this is by far the most comical piece they have presented to a Crookston audience abounding in comical nonsense. They played to a poor business. here doubtless owing, in a measure, to the Dickens entertainment on Wednesday evening and the heavy rain of Thursday evening. We trust they will not feel too much discouraged to ever try it again.

Farm loans completed and money paid over the day application is made.

Elsewhere will be seen a notice of the great combination sale of thoroughbred cattle at Grand Forks on June 20th and 21st. There will be animals from some of the best herds in Dakota offered for sale and opportunity thus presented for obtaining thoroughbred animals from some of the most noted families is rare indeed in the Northwest. There will also be offered for sale a number of thoroughbred mares and colts from trotting stock. No farmer should neglect this opportunity to examine a fine lot of animals and to obtain a choice specimen. They will be sold for cash or on time. Don't forget the dates June 20th and 21st at Grand Forks.

Our weather this year seems to come in installments,—in chunks, as it were.

W. P. McKinstry, general agent for the St. Paul Fire and Marine Insurance Co., Fargo, D. T., was in the city for a few days, gave THE JOURNAL a very pleasant call on Tuesday. He thinks Crookston is the Queen City of the Northwest.

C. G. Rapp passed through the city on Monday, on his way to Goodhue County, where he will visit old friends. He reports the water at St. Hilaire the highest ever known, reaching 6 inches of the bridge, but not high enough to flood buildings.

W. J. Makin, Co. I, 20th Infantry, Camp Poplar, Montana, stopped off on his way home last Monday. Having served his five years' enlistment, he is going to put off that uniform which attracted the attention of our people, for a civilian's dress.

Burglars entered Fontaine & Anglim's clothing store last Saturday night and secured $22 in cash, six valises and clothing to the value of $250 to $500. Chief Hayes is working the case and that means the probable arrest of the culprits and recovery of the goods.

The reading room has been greatly improved by fresh paint and a new carpet. The ladies renew their invitation, extended to all, to come in and enjoy its privileges. They intend to have a farmers' dinner on the Fourth, with ice cream and cake in the afternoon and evening.

Mrs. Burgess, wife of brakesman Burgess, is very seriously sick with blood poisoning, which originated in her hand and extended to her arm. Fears are entertained that amputation of the arm will be necessary, although Dr. Van Dyke, who is attending the case, says there is a possible chance of saving it.

The Salmagundi Club held their regular meeting and election on Friday evening, June 8th, at the home of Miss Aaker. The officers elected were:

President—C. F. Mix.
Vice President—J. W. Wheeler.
Secretary—Miss M. A. Brown.

Mr. O. B. Durdall, of Albert Lea, Minn., gave THE JOURNAL a pleasant call on Monday. He says that the crops that he has seen in Polk County look far better than in his section of country. They have had more rain there. He says it rained for 20 consecutive days.

Last Sunday night Ham Thompson's bull dog feasted on certain three fowls which were the pride of Ham's heart, and valued by him at $15. Our reporter saw Ham Monday morning and he expressed an inclination to carve that dog with his pet razor which he knows so well how to wield.

The M. E. Sunday school observed Sunday, June 10th, as Children's Day, both in the morning and evening. The house was beautifully decorated, thanks to the young ladies, who on Saturday provided themselves with rubber boots and braved the storm in order to secure the flowers needed.

B. Loe is bragging over the arrival of a Star Bashaw trotter, which event is scarcely a fortnight old, but to make it unpleasant for Loe the little chap has managed in some way to injure one of its eyes so badly as to require the services of a veterinarian. Dr. Tooly attended to the colt and the grand jury last week, and it is hought both will recover—in time.

Ole P. Renne, of Garden, served his country as grand juror this term. He reports the crops looking extra fine in his neighborhood, and farmers indulging in hopes for an extra wheat crop. Says it has been an unusually fine spring for wheat, and he thinks Polk County will show up bigger than ever this fall. With a big crop and good prices business will be booming next fall.

Gallipolis, O. Journal: Rev. Charles Carroll left yesterday for St. Paul and the Northwest to be absent a few weeks on a trip of recreation. We hope his trip may be pleasant; but not quite so pleasant as to wean him from his charge here, where he has made many friends, and served his congregation ably and well. The Baptist Church of this city was never so prosperous as now.

Ed. Wile has received one of the new Haley shut-off nozzles and is so well pleased with its working that hereafter our fire department will use the Haley shut-off. It is so arranged that the nozzleman can control the stream to suit himself, shut it off whenever he likes or spray himself upon occasion. It can be attached to any nozzle and is a very useful invention.

Tom Sprague put in an appearance Friday last, which proves that Friday is not always an unlucky day. Tom looks as healthy, hearty and good natured as ever, all the same like he had not been used to poison gophers for a year or so. He says he has a patent "what is bad medicine on the gophers, killing 'em joost so kvick like lightning." All Tom has to do is to fix his eagle eye on a gopher and he is a gone coon at once.

Attention is called to the new ad. of Huggard, Larson & Co., who this week take possession of their new quarters, corner of Robert and Broadway. The boys are doing a rattling business and well deserve it as they are not too hide-bound to put a few dollars into printer's ink to inform their patrons where they can find the best bargains in agricultural implements. If you desire anything in their line, give the boys a call and you will be sure of fair treatment, and a good bargain. Remember the new place. Sign of the Jackson wagon.

Warren Register: A number of our farmers and business men furnished a "farmers lunch," free to all, each day of the Institute last week. We made use of the opportunity to lay in a square meal, and had we eaten all we were urged to to take in by Frank Whitney and Billy Box, who did the honors, Falstaff would have been a baby in size compared to our proportions. After exhausting our gastronomic capacity, we fell back in good order, leaving enough provender in sight to round out the lean and lank proportions of the rest of the Marshall County newspaper fraternity.

Struck by Lightning.

During the storm on Friday last, lightning struck the residence of Andrew Eiken, doing considerable damage. It evidently struck the roof of the woodshed first, tearing a hole a foot in diameter and scattering furniture about the house in every direction, knocking off plastering, breaking windows and tearing off siding. Mrs. Eiken and the children were in the house. Mrs. E. was rendered insensible and the children shocked. Mr. Eiken was going into his barn through the window at the time and was knocked down face foremost and remained for some minutes insensible. A small hole was made in his hat and one side of his face and neck were blistered. He felt a numbness in his side and limbs for several days. One of Senator Steenerson's children was shocked, as was Ole Hanson's little boy. No fatal injuries are reported, though it was a fearfully close call for Mr. and Mrs. Eiken.

A Venerable Relic.

Mr. Andrew Nelson received from Manitoba two pieces of a grave stone that he has mended, dressed down and marked as follows:

"In Memory of Sarah Philena, wife of Alonzo Bernard, who died Oct. 25th, 1853 of quick consumption, the result of ten years experience and suffering as a missionary for the good of the Indians, aged 34 years and 19 days.

Ps. 32; 3d and 37; 3."

"This stone was brought from Selkirk Manitoba, 1884, broken, it was laid upon the grave, afterward removed and lost, recovered and reverently returned June 21st 1888."

It is said that the stone, when found, was doing duty as door steps for a thrifty freed who, being unable to dwell in marble halls was getting as near to it as circumstances and his means would permit.

Distinguished Guests.

During the storm on Friday evening an extra train rolled into the yard and side-tracked for the night. It was an excursion train planned by C. H. Warren, of the Manitoba road, for the purpose of showing eastern agricultural editors and others what this country is like. The party consisted of: Orange Judd, Prairie Farmer, Chicago, Ills.; Milton George, and H. W. Wood, Western Rural, Chicago, Ills.; N. J. Coleman, Commissioner of Agriculture, and his private secretary O. D. Ladow, Washington, D. C.; C. D. Coleman, Rural World, St. Louis; W. Atkinson, Farm Journal, Philadelphia, W. H. Lawrence, Ohio Farmer, Cleveland; J. B. Connor, Indiana Farmer, Indianapolis; A. W. Cheever, New England Farmer, Boston; C. H. Morton, American Agriculturist, New York; G. W. Hill, Farmer, St. Paul; Dr. C. J. Alloway, Territorial Veterinarian, Grand Forks; Col. John H. Stevens, Minneapolis; Col. W. M. Liggett, Benson; H. C. Hansbrough, Devils Lake, D. T.; Hon. S. S. Blanchard, Blanchard, D. T.; The plans for taking the party around the city were broken up by the severe storm which for the time rendered it impossible so the party did not get much of an opportunity to see what our city is like. Many of our citizens went down to the train, however, met the gentlemen and entertained them to the best of their ability. Never before in the history of our city has such a rain storm been known and it came at a very inopportune time for the best interests of our city as such an opportunity of showing what our city is does not present itself every day. The party left at 9:30 for Winnipeg.

DIED.

Deceased was married to David Welsh in Grand Forks, D. T., four years ago and has lived in this city ever since, Besides a husband to mourn her loss she leaves a father two brothers and a sister. She had been in failing health for the past two years, and although a hopeless case almost from the first the blow comes with a crushing force to the devoted husband who had done all in human power to prolong her life and still hoped against hope that she might be spared him many years; but it was not so willed; the fiat had gone forth and she was called to lay down her young life in its early morn and enter upon eternal rest. Her husband has the sympathy of a host of friends in his sore bereavement.

There will be no service in the Episcopal Church next Sunday evening. It being the third Sunday in the month, there will be a union service under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. in the Baptist Church conducted by the Rev. Medlar.

Charles Dickens' Reading.

Owing to the play at the opera house on Wednesday evening, June 6th, the audience that gathered in McKinnon's Hall to hear Charles Dickens Jr., was rather small. Those present, however, who were fortunate enough to secure seats near the platform, enjoyed a real treat, as would the others, could they have heard all that was said. Mr. Dickens, possessing a voice rather lighter than the average, and speaking in a dialect not familiar to Americans, failed to reach those of his hearers seated fartherest from the platform. Aside from this, his reading was above criticism. In the first of his two selections, Dr. Marigold's Story, he personified the traveling tradesman to perfection. His best effort, however, and the one which gave the most entertainment to his hearers, was from the "Pickwick Trial." Throughout this reading, he kept the house in the best of humor, as he possesses the happy faculty of personifying each character presented, in the most amusing manner. His face would take the expression of the stern judge, pompous counsel, roguish witness or shallow-minded woman in the most ludicrous fashion. He acts as an interpreter of his father, giving intelligence to that which the average American reader does not and cannot understand or appreciate. We think the general feeling of the audience was expressed by the young man who remarked as he left the hall: "Well that was worth while!"

Report of the Grand Jury.

THE STATE OF MINNESOTA, }
County of Polk. }

The undersigned, the Grand Jury, duly impanneled and summoned to inquire into the crimes committed within the borders of the county and to inspect the jail and the records of the several offices of said county at the June, 1888, term of the district court of said county, do most respectfully report: That we have visited the jail building in said county and find that although the said building is unfit for a prison in its present condition, we believe that it can be moved to the court house square, where sufficient drainage can be had, and at a small expense be repaired and put in good condition for the purposes of a jail. We therefore recommend that the said jail building be moved from its present location and put in good condition on the said court house square; that the lot where the jail now stands be sold for the best terms possible. We have examined the several offices of said county and find that the Auditor's and the Treasurer's offices are in great and pressing need of a fire proof vault of sufficient sise to hold and protect the papers, books and documents of those offices and the iron safes in those offices be sold, unless the same shall be considered necessary for the preservation of the records and property of said county. All of which is respectfully submitted to the Hon. Ira B. Mills, Judge of said court.

A Card Of Thanks.

To those who so kindly assisted me during the last sickness of my beloved wife and in performing the last sad ceremonies to the dead, I would return my heartfelt thanks. Should there be any, whom the promptings of natural ties ought to have urged to the use of greater exertion, and who, until too late neglected to discharge that duty, such I will leave to their own consciences and that God, who judgeth all men aright, hoping that they may never be called upon to suffer like neglect.

DANIEL WELSH.

THE DRUMMER BOY HERO.

Bravo as a Lion Was He and the Stern Captain Held Him to His Heart.

The Cosmopolitan.

On the first day of the battle of Custozza, the twenty-fourth of July, 1848, about sixty soldiers belonging to one of the Italian infantry regiments, having been sent to occupy an isolated house on a height, were unexpectedly attacked by two companies of Austrians, who, firing on them from different points, barely gave them time to take refuge in the house and hastily barricade the doors, leaving several dead and wounded in the fields. After barricading the doors the Italian soldiers hastily ran to the windows on the first floor and began to pour a steady fire into the assailants, who were gradually advancing in a semi-circle, and replying vigorously.

The sixty Italians were commanded by two subalterns and a captain, a tall old fellow, lean and severe, with white hair and moustaches; with them was a Sardinian drummer boy, a boy not much more than fourteen years old, and who scarcely appeared to be twelve; he was small, with an olive brown face and two sparkling little deep black eyes. The captain was directing the defence from a window on the first floor, shouting his orders like pistol shots and with no sign of emotion on his hard face. The drummer boy, who was a little pale but firm on his legs, got up on a table and was stretching out his neck to see out of the windows and leaning against the wall; through the smoke he saw the white uniforms of the Austrians, who were slowly advancing through the fields. The house was situated on a summit of a steep slope and on the side towards the slope had but one small window, high up, which looked out from the garret; therefore the Austrians did not threaten the house from that side and the slope was clear; their fire was directed only towards the front and the two sides.

It was an infernal fire, a hail of leaden bullets, which on the outside cracked the walls and crumbled the tiles, and on the inside smashed ceilings, furniture, window frames, and door posts; filling the air with splinters, clouds of plaster and bits of pottery and glass; hissing, rebounding, crashing into everything with a noise fit to drive one mad. From time to time one of the soldiers who were firing from the windows fell back on the floor, and was dragged to one side. Some tottered from room to room, pressing their hands on their wounds. In the kitchen there was already one dead man, with a ball through his forehead. The semi-circle of the enemy kept closing up.

All at once the captain who until then had been impassible, was seen to show signs of uneasiness and to stride out of the room followed by a sergeant. About three minutes afterwards the sergeant came rushing back and called the drummer boy, beckoning him to follow. The boy ran after him up a wooden stair-case, and went with him into an empty garret, where he saw the captain, who was writing with a pencil on a sheet of paper, leaning against the window, with a well-rope on the floor at his feet.

The captain folded the paper and looking with his cold, grayish eyes, before which all the soldiers trembled, into the eyes of the boy, said abruptly:

"Drummer boy!" The drummer boy saluted. The captain said, "You've got grit." The boy's eyes lighted up.

"Yes, captain," he answered.

"Look down there," said the captain, rushing him to the window, "in the plains near the houses of Villafranca, where there is a glittering of bayonets. Those are our friends, standing idle. Take this note catch hold of the rope, slide down from the window, run down the hill, go through the field and give the note to the first officer you see. Chuck away your belt and knapsack."

The boy took off his belt and knapsack and put the note in his breast pocket; the sergeant threw out the rope and grasped one end of it with both hands; the captain helped the boy pass backwards through the little window. "Take care," he said to him, "the safety of the detatchment depends upon your courage and on your legs."

"Trust me, captain," replied the drummer boy, swinging himself out.

"Stoop as you go down," said the captain again, helping the sergeant to hold the rope.

"Never fear."

"God help you!"

In a few minutes the boy was on the ground; the sergeant drew up the rope and disappeared; the captain sprang to the window and saw the boy flying down the hill.

He was already hoping that he had succeeded in escaping unobserved, when five or six little clouds of dust which rose from the ground both before and behind the boy warned him that he had been seen by the Austrians, who were firing at him from the top of the hill. Those little clouds were earth thrown up by the bullets. But the boy continued to run at a breakneck pace. All at once he fell.

"Killed!" roared the captain, biting his fist. But he had scarcely said the word when he saw the boy get up. "Ah! only a fall!" he said to himself, and breathed again. In fact, the boy began to run again as fast as he could, but he limped. "A sprained ankle," thought the captain.

A few little more clouds of dust rose here and there around the boy, but they were always farther off. He was safe. The captain gave an exclamation of triumph. But he continued to follow him anxiously with his eyes, because it was a question of minutes; if he did not get down there as quickly as possible with the note, which requested immediate relief, either all his soldiers would be killed or he would have to surrender and become prisoners with them. The boy ran swiftly for a while and then limped and slackened his pace, and then broke into a run again, but he seemed to become more and more fatigued, and every little while stumbled and paused for a moment.

"Perhaps he has been hit by a glancing bullet," thought the captain, and he shudderingly watched all his movements, and encouraged him and spoke to him as if the boy could hear him; he measured incessantly with keen eyes the distance interposing between the running boy and the glittering of arms which he saw down there in the plain in the midst of the wheat fields, gilded by the sun. And meanwhile he heard the whistling and the noise of the bullets in the rooms below, the imperious and angry cries of the officers and sergeants, the groans of the wounded and the crushing of the furniture and plaster. "Up! courage!" he cried, following with his gaze the distant boy. "Forward! run! he has stopped, curse him! Ah! he is running again."

An officer came, out of breath, to say that the enemy, without ceasing their fire, were waving a white flag as a summons to surrender.

"Don't answer!" he cried without removing his eyes from the boy, who was already in the plain, but who was no longer running, and who appeared to be dragging himself along with difficulty.

"But get on! run!" said the captain, grinding his teeth and clenching his fists; "kill yourself, die, scoundrel, but go on!" Then a terrible oath burst from him. "Ah! the infamous coward! he has sat down!"

In fact, the boy, whose head till now he had seen projecting above a wheat field, had disappeared, as if he had fallen. But in a moment his head came into view again; finally he was lost behind the hedges, and the captain saw him no more.

He then flew down stairs; it was raining bullets; the rooms were encumbered with the wounded, some of whom reeled about like drunken men, catching at the furniture; walls and floors were spattered with blood; corpses were lying across the doors; the lieutenant's arm had been broken by a ball; everything was in a whirl of smoke and dust.

"Courage!" yelled the captain. "Stick to your posts! Relief is coming! Courage for a little longer!"

The Austrians had drawn nearer yet, their contorted faces loomed through the smoke; above the rattle of the firing rose their savage cries, insulting, demanding surrender, threatening slaughter. Occasionally a soldier, terror-stricken, retreated from the window; the sergeant drove him back, but the defenders' fire was slackening; their faces showed discouragement; it was impossible to prolong the resistance. Suddenly the firing of the Austrians slackened and a thundering voice shouted, first in German, then in Italian:

"Surrender!"

"No," howled the captain from a window.

And the firing began again steadier and fiercer on both sides. More soldiers fell. Already more than one window was without defenders. The fatal moment was close at hand. The captain was muttering between his teeth in a broken voice: "They're not coming! They're not coming!" and he ran furiously about, twisting his sabre in his clenched hand, resolving to die, when a sergeant, coming down from the garret, cried in a loud voice, "They're coming!"

"They're coming," the captain repeated with a shout of joy. At this all shout, unhurt, wounded, sergeants and officers rush to the windows, and once more the resistance grew fierce. A few moments after a sort of uncertainty and beginning of disorder were remarked in the enemy. Immediately, in great haste, the captain formed a company down stairs, with fixed bayonets, ready to make a sally. Then he flew up stairs again. He had scarcely got up there when they heard a heavy tread, accompanied by a formidable hurrah, and from the windows they saw advancing through the smoke the two-cornered hats of the Italian carbineers, a squadron dashing along at full speed, and the flashing of sword blades brandished in the air, decending on the heads, shoulders and backs of the enemy. Then the little troop rushed out of the door with lowered bayonets; the enemy wavered, became disordered and took flight; the ground remained clear, the house was free, and a short time after the height was occupied by two cannons.

The captain, with his remaining soldiers, rejoined his regiment, fought again and was slightly wounded in the left hand by a glancing ball, in the last bayonet charge. The day ended in victory for us.

But the day after the fight having begun again the Italians were overwhelmed, in spite of a brave resistance, by the superior numbers of the Austrains, and on the morning of the 26th they were compelled to retreat sorrowfully towards the Mincio.

The captain, although wounded, marched on foot with his soldiers, who were tired and silent, and towards sunset reached Goito on the Mincio and immediately sought out his lieutenant, who had been picked up, with a broken arm, by our ambulance, and who had arrived there first. He was directed to a church, where a field hospital had hastily been installed. He went there. The church was full of wounded, reclining on two rows of beds and mattresses stretched on the floor; two doctors and various assistants were anxiously going and coming, and stifled cries and groans were heard.

On entering, the captain stood and looked about him, in search of his officer. Just then he heard a faint voice close by calling him:

"Captain"

He turned around; it was the drummer boy; he was stretched on a trestle bed, covered up to the chest by a coarse window curtain with little red and white squares, with his arms out; he was pale and thin, but with his two eyes still sparkling, like two black gems.

"Are you here?" the captain asked him, in an astonished but stern manner. "Bravo! You did your duty."

"I did what I could," answered the drummer boy.

"Have you been wounded?" said the captain, looking around for his officer in the beds near by.

"What would you have?" said the boy, who took courage to speak from the proud pleasure of being wounded for the first time, and without which he would not have dared to open his mouth in the presence of the captain. "I had to run like a hunchback, they saw me immediately. I should have arrived twenty minutes sooner if they hadn't hit me. Fortunately I found a staff captain directly to whom to give the note. But it was hard coming down after that lick! I was dying of thirst, kept thinking that I shouldn't get there, and was crying with rage to think that every minute's delay some one was going to the other world up there at the house. Bah! I did what I could. I am contented. But, allow me, captain. Look at yourself. You are bleeding."

In fact, from the captain's badly bandaged palm a few drops of blood were trickling down his fingers.

"Do you want me to tighten the bandage, Captain? Hold it out a moment."

The captain held out his left hand, and put out his right to help the boy to undo and retie the knot; but no sooner had the boy raised himself from the pillow than he grew pale, and was compelled to rest his head again.

"Enough, enough," said the captain looking at him and drawing away his bandaged hand, which the boy wished to keep, "take care of yourself instead of thinking of others, because even slight things can become serious when they are neglected."

The drummer boy shook his head.

"But you," said the captain, looking at him attentively "you must have lost a good deal of blood, to be as weak as that."

"Lost much blood?" answered the boy, with a smile. "More than blood. Look!"

And with a jerk he pulled off the covering.

The captain stepped back, horrified.

The boy had but one leg; his left leg had been amputated above the knee and the stump was bandaged with rags which were covered with blood.

Just then a fat little army surgeon passed in his shirt sleeves.

"Ah, Captain," he said, quickly, nodding at the drummer boy, "that is an unfortunate case, one leg which could have been saved easily if he had not forced it in that mad way; a cursed inflammation; it had to be cut off at once. Oh, but a brave boy, I assure you, he didn't shed a tear nor utter a cry! On my word of honor. I was proud he was an Italian boy, while I was operating. He came of good stock."

And he hurried away.

The captain frowned and looked intently at the drummer boy while drawing the covering over him again; then slowly, almost without knowing it, and still looking at him, he raised his hand to his head and lifted his cap.

"Captain!" exclaimed the boy in surprise, "what are you doing, Captain?—to me?"

And then the rough soldier who had never said a gentle word to an inferior replied in an inexpressible soft and affectionate voice:

"I am a captain; you are a hero."

Then he threw himself with open arms on the little drummer boy, and kissed him three times on the heart.

A Tennessee Idyl

From the Nashville American.

The nicest little episode of the season in social life occurred at the residence of a charming family on Spruce-street just the other day.

One of our best known citizens, a man of high social standing, who is as polite as he is ingenuous in his social relations, heard that an old friend, Mrs. Judge D. from a neighboring town in the State of Alabama, was in the city. His remembrance of the charming Mrs. D. when she was Miss— and he was the most gallant of all the beaux in that circle of cultivated people in the old town of H., carried him back to youth's fitful frivolities, when the flash of the maiden's eye quickened the heart's throbbings, and to a friend he said: "Well, by George, I will go and see Mattie. I have not seen her in 30 years! Wonder if she will know me? Go with me and see us meet; it will be youth's pleasures brought back for the hour. Go and see us meet. But don't you tell her who I am. Don't; be certain. Wonder if she will know me?" And stepping into a barber's shop he said: "Do me up; do me up nice; make me look as young as possible; confound these gray whiskers. But never mind, I'll put on the smile of youth."

Reaching the residence, he was met in the hall by the elegant Miss—. He gave again special instructions not to be introduced, again ejaculating: "I wonder if she will know me?" Entering the parlor where sat in lovely chat a charming bevy of ladies the central figure of whom was Mrs. Judge D., and a most lovely woman she was, too, with a head of hair as beautiful as hoar frost, but a bright, smiling face, which marked a charming contrast with the whitening locks above. Approaching her with no introduction, but extended hands and the smile of youth under a frosty beard, and with a keen and lively remembrance of the days long gone by, he said, with the heroic confidence of an Andrew Jackson and the politeness of a Robert I. Chester: "Mattie, do you know me?" Mrs. Judge D., catching the spirit and not to be beaten in the open field, politely rose, all smiling. She accepted both hands which he had tendered with the bewitching tenderness of a rejuvenated beau, but said, with coy forgetfulness: "You take me by surprise. Like myself, you can't conceal the creeping years, and one whose head is silvery as mine can't be expected to remember even old friends of the youthful period. Please tell me your name. You keep me in suspense."

"But" said the Nashville friend, with the politeness born with all the true gentlemen of this good old city of social gentleness: "Why, Mattie, don't you know me? Look into my eyes; think back 30 years ago; take a good look. I would know you anywhere. Your eye is just the same. You were charmingly beautiful when young, and time has only changed the beauty of youth into the charms of the matron. Well, well, Mattie, I am surprised."

"But, said the lovely woman whose charms had been so familiarly handled. "My name is not Mattie. Judge D's first wife was named Mattie."

It is only necessary to say that the hero of the occasion covered himself all over with glory in the retreat. Joe Johnston couldn't have beaten it in his palmiest days.

Why They Hate Chinese Cheap Labor.

From the New York Herald.

Australian authorities find the same difficulty with Chinese immigration that exists in California. The Chinese encounter no more trouble in having everything their own way in the control of labor in the English colonies than they found in American States. It is the fulfillment of the law that whenever the cheap and thrifty labor of the Oriental competes with that of the white races it wins and supplants. In every quality of civilized action, except the martial spirit, the Oriental shows a superiority which we accept by taking refuge in hostile legislation. In Germany and Russia the Hebrew, an Oriental race, is persecuted, because the Hebrew by his superior intellect makes all the money. In the American and Australian countries the Chinaman is persecuted because in the laboring field he will earn all the wages.

The Miseries of Misers.

Pittsburg Dispatch.

Perhaps the most famous miser that ever lived was John Elwes, an Englishman, who died from neglect because he refused to incur the expense of physicians and nurses, though worth not less than $4,000,000. In the case of John Elwes, his sordid character was not the result of ignorance, for he was a graduate of a Swiss university and later in life was a member of Parlament. His greed of gold was an hereditary sin. He was a son of a London brewer, who died when the boy was only four years old. His mother survived, but to such an extent did her passion for money gain a hold upon her that, though she had $500,000 in her own right, she actually starved to death. An uncle, Sir Harvey Elwes, was also a miser, and the example of these two blood relatives exercised such an influence upon John Elwes that he became the most famous miser of three centuries. After his return tn England from Geneva Elwes moved in fashionable London society, where his prospective wealth entitled him to recognition.

When he visited his uncle in Suffolk, where the latter lived in the most abject penury, his hopeful nephew would play a double part. He would wear his fashionable garments as far as a little inn in Chelmsford, where he exchanged them for a pair of patched trousers, a worn out coat, darned stockings, and clodhopper shoes with iron buckles. In this attire he would call upon his uncle. The latter would not permit a fire on cold March days on the score of its beign extravagant, and the two would sit with a crust of bread and one glass of wine between them until it was too dark to see each other's faces, and then they would retire to save the expense of candles. When this uncle died he left his nephew a fortune of $1,000,000.

As he grew older, John Elwes developed the terrible avarice that marked his life by a passion for cards. He would sit in his threadbare clothes with the Duke of Northumberland and play with feverish eye and trembling hand with thousands at stake, and then after having lost or won as the case might be, he would walk to his miserable lodgings three miles distant, in a peltering rain rather than pay for a cab.

Elwes owned a magnificent country seat in Berkshire. When he would leave London to visit it he would put three hard boiled eggs and some crusts of bread in his pockets, then mounting a horse would ride over fields and through lanes, going miles out of his way to avoid roads where he would have to pay a few pennies toll. A more than faithful biographer says of him:

"He would eat his provisions in the in the last stage of putrefaction rather than have a fresh joint from the butcher, and at one time he wore a wig about a fortnight which he picked out of a rut in a lane and which had apparently been thrown away by a beggar."

At his country seat he allowed of no repair save a little brown paper or a bit of broken glass. During the harvest he would amuse himself with going into the fields to glean the corn on the ground of his own tenants, and they used to leave a little more than common to please the old gentleman, who was as eager after it as any pauper in the parish. To save bed coverings, before his death, he would go to sleep completely dressed with boots and hat on. He died miserably, his mind weakened by worry and privation. The value of his fortune, which went to two sons, was not less than $4,000,000.

Another celebrated miser was Ephraim Lapes Pereira, Baron d'Aguilar, formerly cashier to the Empress Maria Theresa of Austria. Strange to say, the early years of his life at the Austrain Court were years of splendor. Then he moved to England, married a wealthy lady and settled down. He lived in sumptuous style; kept several carriages and twenty servants. He was married twice, and after the second marriage he left his family and friends and withdrew himself from the fashionable world. He turned farmer. At this time he was worth $1,000,000. After a year in the country his place began to be known as "Starvation Farmyard." His cattle and poultry were a mass of skid and bones, and peasants began to hoot at the Baron whenever he appeared for the mean treatment of his annimals. He always insisted on being present when the stock was being fed so that he might see that there was nothing stolen or wasted. He went about his farm clad in mean and dirty clothes, and refused to spend money to buy new ones. After a life of selfishness and meanness he died in March, 1802, leaving property estimated at $1,100,000. His diamonds alone were worth $150,000, while his solid silver plate weighed over 700 pounds.

But exceeding by far the example of John Elwes is that of Daniel Dancer, whose life is the most striking example perhaps in all history of the insatiable thirst for gold. His father died and left him, together with a sister, a comfortable fortune. Dancer and his sister lived in a miserable hut near Harrow, in Middlesex, Enlgand. Their fare consisted of a piece of cheap beef and fourteen hard dumplings boiled on Sunday, and this lasted them the rest of the week. The pair dressed in rags, and when the sister was dying from cold and starvation her brother refused medical aid on the ground that he could not spend his money for medicine, because if the "old girl" was going to die the doctors couldn't save her anyhow. Dancer was too miserly to provide soap and towels for himself.

He would wash in a neighboring pool and lie out in the sun till he was dried. His clothes, a mass of patches, were held up by a belt of twisted hay, and his whole appearance was that of abject misery. Dancer on his rambles never returned empty-handed. He would gather up the bones in the village streets and lanes, bring them home, and after picking them clean himself would crack them and feed them to his dog. Once neighbors complained that his dog worried and killed their sheep, and for fear that he would have to pay for future depredations, he took the dog to a blacksmith's, where he had all the poor dog's teeth broken off to prevent a further recurrence of trouble. He mended his own shoes and wore one hat continuously for thirteen years.

When he lay on his dying bed his only garment was an old sack. When remonstrated with he said that he came into the world without a shirt and he would go out of it that way. When a visitor suggested that he have a pillow for his head he ordered his only servant, whose weekly wages were thirty cents, to bring him a wisp of hay, which he used as a pillow, till his death, a few days later. He left an estate valued at $25,000, amply sufficient for all his needs during his lifetime, had he so desired. This money in odd sums, was hidden in old rags, nailed down to the under part of the manger floor in his miserable, cow shed, and over $10,000 was found hidden in the manure pile where it had lain for years.

Beware of Pneumonia.

Chicago Times.

"There is not so much pneumonia now as there was last month and during the two preceding ones," said Dr. De Wolf. "Malaria, however, is on the increase. Pneumonia is caused principally by the carelessness of people, who, when they find one spring day, immediately change their clothing. Winter clothing should not be materially changed in this climate until good weather has come to stay, about the middle of May or the first of June. Bad drainage undoubtedly produces malarial diseases, but it is not well to dogmatize upon the subject when we remember that the death rate from malaria is very high on the Berkshire hills in Massachusetts, where drainage scarcely enters into the consideration of disease. To escape pneumonia people should be more careful in spring than during winter, and to avoid every appearance of chill should not change the quantity or quality of underwear until June."

Dr. W. M. Tomlinson, also of the health office, said:

"Soft weather, as it is called, is the principal cause of pneumonia. People expose themselves thoughtlessly, and when the first fine day appears leave off their overcoats or change their underclothing. It is not generally understood as it ought to be, that when a thaw comes after a severe cold spell we are much more apt to catch cold than when the thermometer is down to zero. When the weather is very cold a man who has taken exercise and is perspiring may sit down even in the open air with comparative immuuity from chill, but if it should be thawing the same man is apt to catch a severe cold. A process of evaporation is going on in the latter case, and the body throws off heat in a way which renders one peculiarly liable to chill. People require warm clothing more in spring than in winter on account of the sudden and dangerous climatic changes. Cold baths, when taken regularly and properly, form a good preventive of colds and pneumonia. By bathing properly is meant that a person should remain in the water a very short time, and that more rapid circulation should immediately follow the bath. Those who can not take a cold bath without experiencing a chilled sensation while dressing and afterward should not take cold baths at all."

He Made Her Majesty Gasp.

Porter Rhodes, who discovered the biggest diamond ever found at the Cape, believes quite as firmly in his jewels as the queen does in hers. It weighs 150 carats and is perfectly clear, having "lights like white satin through it." Out at the Cape Mr. Rhodes placed on exhibition, and charged $5 admission fee, clearing a handsome sum for one of the hospitals. When he came home to England the other day the queen heard of him and expressed a desire to see his diamond. The possessor not being accustomed to the etiquette of the courts, he was carefully warned against contradicting her majesty, who is somewhat impatient of such things, and was bade to make no comparisons. He got on very well until the queen, having examined it with considerable interest, laid it down with the remark that it was handsome, but not so large as her Koh-i-noor.

"Koh-i-noor!" cried the indignant diamond digger, contemptuously, wrought out of remembrance of warnings, "why, the old thing can't touch mine. It's a deal bigger than yours, and I wouldn't give this diamond for two of your Koh-i-noors." The queen fairly gasped with amazement at his audacity, and had him peremptorily bundled out with his impertinent jewel.—New York World.

Various Types of Gossipers.

The most dangerous type of gossiper is not the woman who has won a renown in her profession. Her notoriety is our protection. We are on our guard in her presence. We speak cautiously and listen indifferently, and she is only able to injure where she is not known.

Far more to be dreaded is the really good hearted but indiscreet and garrulous woman who loves to impart information. I know some excellent wives and mothers, devout church members, and tireless workers for charity, who would be indignant were they classed among the despised gossips.

Yet these same women have related in my presence the outlived errors of people whom I loved and respected. They have brought out the folded and filed away follies, long hid in the dusty pigeon holes of the past, for my eyes to peruse in the glaring light of the present. They did not mean to be malicious—they simply lacked the strength of mind to be silent concerning an old tale which could in no wise benefit me to hear. It was the love of imparting information, the impulse to astonish rather than any wish to inquire. But its effect was pernicious and harmful.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Aristocratic Professions.

Of professions in England only four are really first rate, viz: The Church, the bar, the army and the navy Medicine and surgery are socially second rate. In England young men who are technically "gentlemen" seldom become doctors. But because the first four vocations named are regarded as peculiarly suited to gentlemen, it must not be inferred that they are mainly recruited from the aristocracy. Numerically speaking, we should have to relegate the great majority of Anglican clergymen, of the members of the bar of officers of the navy and (since the abolition of the purchase of commissions) of the army also to the lower middle rather than the upper middle class.

Look, for instance, at the curates at the mob of barristers, to say nothing of solicitors (who almost always belong to the class first mentioned, and between whom and the barristers yawns a broad social gulf), and at the officers in most regiments of the infantry and cavalry of the line. The artillery and the engineers were always in England drawn from a lower social medium, as they were in France also under the ancien regime—a fact with which the graduates of West Point are not always familiar.

Traditions of the Nails.

Considerable care and attention have always been paid to the nails, and many curious ideas and beliefs with regard to them exist, even among our own people.

A curious Jewish tradition reports that Adam was entirely clothed in a hard, horny skin, and only lost it and became subject to evil spirits on losing Paradise. The nails are the remnants of this dress, but they are sacred, and who ever cuts them off and throws the cuttings away does himself an injury. An old Persian Chronicle says that Eve also possessed this dress, and the nails were left to remind them of the loss of Paradise.

The Ancient Edda of the Scandinavians tells of a great ship, Naglfar, which will appear at the last day. It is made of dead men's nails, and parings should not be thrown away, nor should any one die with unpared nails, "for he who dies so, supplies material for the building of that vessel, which gods and men will wish were finished as late as possible."

The Jewish Talmud of Babylon forbids the Jews to leave the nail-parings on the ground, for fear of the consequences to women passing over them. They should be burned or hidden away. Another old work says: "He who burns the parings of his nails is a pious man; he who buries them is equally so; but he who casts them on the earth is an impious man." Many Jews still carefully burn or bury these cuttings. These are taken, inclosed between two small bits of wood and consumed. The reason alleged is that the body should be burned or buried, and that nail paring being left above ground, the soul of the possessor will wander abroad after his death. In Norway they are burned, or else one will have to gather the pieces on the last day.

There are many curious beliefs in regard to the manner in which the nails should be cut. He who has had the habit of paring them frequently will have no good luck, say Andalusian wiseracres, and he who cuts them over a fire, allowing the parings to drop into it, will become a fool. In Iceland, it is believed that any one turning toward the north while trimming his nails will soon die. Norwegian peasants say you must use the knife with which you trim the nails to cut something else before putting it away. If you cut with it three times into wood you are free from any danger of sorcery. Arabs properly regard it as bad taste to bite the nails.

The nails of infants are regarded with peculiar attention in many lands. It is generally thought throughout Europe that they must not be cut at all until the child has attained a certain age. In one part of France, it is said that they must not be trimmed at all or the child will grow slowly; in another that it will not learn to talk soon; in another, that it will be a thief; in another, that cutting them before the child is seven years old, will destroy its wit, while the limit in still another part of the same country is but one year.

In Germany, and in parts of England, it is said that the child will become a thief if its nails are cut while at the breast, and it is prescribed both in these countries and in France, that they should be bitten off, preferably by the mother. Many mothers in our own country believe this, and prefer to use no steel, biting or pinching the tender growths.

An old English proverb says:

> "Better a child had ne'er been born,

In Sicily, to avoid trouble, a piece of money is put into a child's hands the first time its nails are trimmed. Andalusian mothers carefully cut them from behind the door if they wish the child to be a good singer, while Northumberland parents bury the first cutting under an ash tree for the same reason. It is said in many parts of France, and in many parts our country that a 7-months child has no nails.

At to Monday, you should cut them then, if you neglect it Saturday, for then you will not suffer from the toothache, say Vendean peasants. It is also a good day in Berne for a like reason. In the department of Deux-Sevres, France, if you cut them Monday morning, you will have a present or good fortune of some kind during the week. In Pomerania, on the contrary, it is believed that you will have no luck throughout the week, if you cut them on the first day. The same uncertainty attends the operation performed on Tuesday. In Calabria, in Normandy, in Maine and in Valenciennes, to cut them on Tuesday, Wednesday or Friday is unfortunate, for you will have hangnails. It is a lucky day in Berne, for you will never have the malaria or toothache, if you cut them then. In Sussex, England, it is said, if you cut them on Tuesday morning without thinking of a fox's tail, you will get a present. In Lusatia, it is said that cutting them on Wednesday keeps them from growing until the next Sunday. Thursday seems to be a lucky day to perform this act of necessity, for it is without mention in the popular legends. Friday comes in for its share of ill-luck. In the Department of Maine, the person cutting them on Friday will be unfortunate, and in Sussex, England, "Cut them on Friday, you cut them for sorrow," or as a wide-spread belief is embodied in ryme:

> Cut them on Monday, you cut them for health;
> Cut them on Tuesday, you cut them for wealth;
> Cut them on Wednesday, you cut them for news;
> Cut them on Thursday, a new pair of shoes;
> Cut them on Friday, you cut them for sorrow;
> Cut them on Saturday, you see your true love to-morrow;
> Cut them on Sunday, the devil will be with you all the week.

Shakespeare says the nails were called the "ten commandments."

> "Could I come near your beauty with my nails, > I'd set my ten commandments in your face," says the Duchess in King Henry VI.

Our modern dames, in taking such care of the nails are but following the example of their Roman ancestors, who exercised equal concern as to their preservation and adornment. The profession of manicure is doubtless new, but instruments for cutting, polishing and cleaning the nails are frequently seen in museums of antique remains. It is a custom in China for certain professions to allow the nail of the little finger of the right hand to grow an inch or two in length. Eastern ladies dye the nails with henna, staining them with bright pink.—St. Louis Globe.

Duluth Wheat.

DULUTH, Special Telegram, June 9.—There was a more active market for wheat to-day, with prices fluctuating widely in the alternate periods of strength and weakness. The government report for June was the influencing factor, and it was worked for all it was worth. Early in the day dispatches came saying the report made the condition seven points lower than in May, 66 against 72, and the market was very strong. This was soon showed to be a canard, and the official report sent gave the condition as somewhat improved, and prices went off a cent. Later on the full report was received and the last part studied, which showed that there was a big decrease in acreage, causing a good falling off in the estimated yield, and values at once jumped up and continued strong to the end of the session, the close being at the highest point of the day. Trading was almost all in July, August being considerably neglected. Early in the session cash No. 1 hard sold at 84½c, and No. 1 Northern at 82½c. At the close, No. 1 hard was worth 85¾c, nominal; June sold early at 85c, and closed nominally at 85¾c. July sold first at 85c, advanced to 85½@85⅝c, weakened and declined to 84⅝c, grew strong, advancing to 85⅝c, where it closed. August sales ranged from 84⅞ to 86c, with the close at 86½c.

Some Famous Old Men

From the Youth's Companion.

The longevity of famous statesmen is remarkable. Imagine Lord Palmerston acting vigorously as Prime Minister of England when over 80, governing the vast British Empire with steady hand, and making speeches three hours long in the House of Commons, and rising next day fresh as a man of 40. Think of the venerable Guizot, the French statesman, who, at the age of 87, was still writing histories, presiding over religious conventions, and carrying on live discussions in the French Academy.

The late Lord Lyndhurst made able speeches in the House of Lords when he had passed his 90th year; and his long-time rival, Lord Brougham, wrote his autobiography, in three goodly volumes, when he had nearly reached 90 years.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, who, as Lord Henry Petty, was a leading member of the "All the Talents" Cabinet, of which Charles James Fox was the chief, in 1806, was still an active member of the House of Lords nearly sixty years later, in 1863, and died in that year at the age of 83.

In former generations energetic statesmen of advanced years are found thickly scattered through the pages of history. There was the old Marquis of Winchester, who could remember Edward IV., the first York sovereign, in 1483, and who, when he died in 1512, at the age of 97, was holding office under Queen Elizabeth.

Referring to the statesmen of our own country, it is a familiar fact that John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, the second and third Presidents, both died on the 4th of July, 1826, just half a century from the day when both signed the Declaration of Independence, Adams being 91 and Jefferson 73. President Andrew Jackson lived to be 82, John Quincy Adams to be 81, Madison 85.

Heart Disease Cured in a Minute.

Salem (Or.) Statesman.

There is a person in the County Jail who knows a great deal more than he did a few days ago, and his name is Bob Jordan. Jordan, it will be remembered, is awaiting the action of the Grand Jury on a charge of larceny from a dwelling. Recently one of his fellow prisoners named MacReynolds got in his work on Jordan, and solemnly informed him that the authorities had no right to hold in jail a man who is afflicted with heart disease, and pursuaded him to feign to be subject to fainting fits, induced by his diseased (?) heart, as Jordan's hope of acquittal on examination looked mighty blue, and if he could establish a claim to immunity of the operations of the law on that score he would obtain his freedom anyway. Jordan swallowed the bait, and being examined, was bound over, and Wednesday tried his little racket. Sheriff Minto had meanwhile been posted by MacReynolds, who begged to be allowed to see the fun. When the Sheriff was marching Jordan around to his cell to be locked up he suddenly threw up his hands, groaned and fell over to the floor with a terrible bump. The Sheriff quickly seized a bucket of cold water that had been placed conveniently near, and doused him from head to foot. Jordan gasped and spluttered and started to his feet, being assisted in a very handy manner by the toe of Mr. Minto's boot. He was helped to his cell in the same way, the other prisoners following and howling with laughter.

Harmony, Maine, is excited over the report that Chesley Bean, who quit Harmony forty-seven years ago, and has never been heard of since, had recently died in Texas, leaving $11,000,000 worth of property. His sister and two nephews are the only heirs known.

Eddie Williams of Franklin, Me., went hunting, and the gun he carried "kicked" very hard when he fired it. A few days afterward he was taken ill and died. The recoil of the gun had caused concussion of the base of the brain, producing partial paralysis of the spine and digestive organs.

A young man preparing at Cambridge for Harvard college has killed himself by smoking opium. There seem to be some very rapid youth, laboring to grow up at present. Perhaps strychnine cocktails and giant-powder cigarettes will be diversions of the young as civilization gains in intensity and insanity.

A witness in an important case at Palatka, Florida, has just had a signal experience of the hardship often worked by the law's delay. After waiting sixteen days, during each of which he was able to afford himself but one meal a day, he found himself utterly without money, a stranger and friendless, and, but for the help of the judge, might have starved before the case, at last, came to trial.

An eastern paper tells of the queer way in which the town of Orrington, Me., got its name. The citizens decided upon the name of Orangetown, and sent their minister to get an act of incorporation from the legislature. The clerk of that body was a little shaky on orthography, and thought "orring" was the proper way to spell orange. The pastor loved a joke, and so made no correction, but let the word go as written.

Miss Florence Andenried, only child of the late Colonel Andenried, of General Sherman's staff, writing from Rome to a Washington friend, says: "Before leaving I had an audience with the Holy Father, who, as I knelt before him, smoothed my hair and face, held my hands and talked to me in a low, sweet voice. As I arose to go he had me recalled, and again smoothed my face, and finally gave me a beautiful silver medal to always wear for his sake. He is a dear old man, but very feeble."

Women lawyers are becomming a power in the land. Michigan University has already sent out twenty-four young women holding the degree of LL.B.. This year a young woman from the Sandwich Islands, Miss Alma Hitchcock, will make the twenty-fifth. In England there is a club of women lawyers. It is mainly a correspondence club, yearly letters from the members being printed and circulated. Miss Belva Lockwood, and Miss Waugh from the Law School in Chicago, are among the members. The motto of the club is: "All the Allies of Each."

Prof. Humphreys, of England, has been investigating why folks live long and comes to the conclusion that those persons live the longest who might be expected to do so. The first requisite is that the body should be wound up as it were and sent into the world with the initial forces necessary to carry on the life processes through a long period, and that the various vital functions be equitably and harmoniously performed—that a person be built on the principle of Dr. Holmes' one hoss shay. Temperance in eating and drinking are essential and especially in meat eating and alcohol drinking. The average height was a little over five feet and seven inches, and the average weight a little over 154 pounds.

A bad, bad girl down in Todd county, Ky., got up a long-range flirtation with a young Michigander whom she had never seen. Of course they exchanged photographs, but the young woman wickedly sent the picture of a Tennessee cousin in place of her own, and when the lover, who was in deep, dark, deadly earnest, came on to marry her he did not at all recognize her as the lady of his love. However, he swallowed his disappointment bravely, and, after telling her of the house and things upon which he had expended shekels, proproposed instant marriage, but the girl said nay, and a sadder and wiser gander flew northward to the lake region, fully prepared, henceforth, to believe any story of southern outrage the campaign may produce.

DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES.

Grover Cleveland and Allen G. Thurman the Standard Bearers of the Party.

Condensed Proceedings of the Three Days' Proceedings at the St. Louis Convention.

The democratic national convention met at St. Louis according to announcement on June 5, proceeded by two or three days excitement and wrangling over preliminary proceedings.

Senator Barnum of Connecticut, chairman of the democratic national committee, called the convention to order. Bishop J. C. Cranberry of St. Louis then opened the proceedings of the convention with prayer.

At the conclusion of the prayer Mr. Barnum arose and said:

Gentlemen of the Convention: By the unanimous vote of the national committee, the chair has been directed to present to this convention as the list of temporary officers the following, which the secretary will read:

TEMPORARY OFFICERS.

Mr. Prince then read the list as follows: Stephen M. White of California, for chairman [applause]; temporary secretary, Frederick O. Prince of Massachusetts. Assistant secretaries, Alfred Orendorff of Illinois, W. L. Scott of Virginia, T. F. Barrett of St. Louis, Leopold Starus of Alabama, O. M. Hall of Minnesota, John Triplett of George, L. E. Rowley of Michigan, Oliver Newell of Colorado, T. J. Tingle of Missouri, T. L. Merrill of Nebraska. Reading secretaries, Hon. Thomas Pettit, house of representatives. Assistant reading clerks, Michael T. Barrett of New Jersey, T. O. Walker of Iowa, R. H. Henry of Mississippi, John W. Kern of Indiana, J. P. Carro of Missouri, F. D. Sawyer of Ohio, William P. Bentley of Missouri. Official stenographer, Edward B. Dickinson of New York. Sergeant-at-arms, Richard J. Bright. Chief doorkeeper, Daniel Abel St. Louis.

The convention unanimously adopted the list read by Mr. Prince.

THE COMMITTEES.

Among the members of the committee reelected were these:

Minnesota—Chairman, P. B. Winston; secretary, E. C. Stringer, resolutions, E. C. Stringer; credentials, D. W. Mayo; organization, T. T. Hudson; committeeman, M. Doran.

Wisconsin—Chairman, G. M. Woodard; secretary, T. F. Frawley; resolutions, W. H. Seamen; credentials, S. V. Dickinson; organization, W. Lameroux; committeeman, J. L. Mitchell.

Iowa—Chairman, W. H. M. Pusey; secretary, A. F. Morrison; resolutions, F. W. Lehmann; credentials, S. S. Caruthers; organization, L. L. Ainsworth; committeeman, J. J. Richardson.

Dakota was relegated to the rear until the contest between the Day and Church factions were settled by the committee on credentials, which eventually upheld Church and pulverized Day.

SOME RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. T. J. Campbell of New York sent up to the desk, so that it might be read, a long preamble and resolutions, prepared by himself and signed by a large number of prominent Democrats, as follows.

Whereas, We believe that the safety and continuity of republican institutions on this continent imperatively demands the recognition and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine in all its length and breadth; that territorial acquisition or aggrandizement in this quarter of the world by foreign and monarchical powers should not only be discountenanced, but should be discouraged and prohibited by every means in our power; that it is our duty as well as our interest to establish and maintain the most friendly diplomatic and commercial relations with our sister republic, Mexico, with Central and South America, to extend to them such moral aid and sympathy as they may need to protect themselves from unrighteous encroachments of European powers upon their territory, or officious interference in their internal governmental affairs; and further, if necessary to maintain the supremacy of the Monroe doctrine on this continent, we should be prepared to make and enforce the demands against whatever power may undertake to evade or disregard it. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be transmitted as represented to the national Democratic convention which is to assemble at St. Louis on the 5th day of June, 1888, for such recognition thereof and such action thereon as the said convention may see fit to take concerning the same.

It was referred to the committee on resolutions without debate.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

The chairman announced that the secretary would read a petition for the consideration of the convention. The paper proved to be a request from the woman's convention recently held in Washington, stating that two of its members had been appointed to make a short talk to the convention on behalf of the women of America. This request was accompanied by a promise that if it were granted by the convention the representation of the woman's organization would only occupy the attention of the convention for ten minutes. The communication was signed by Virginia L. Miner and E. A. Merriweather. J. J. O'Donohue of New York moved that the women be heard and it was agreed to.

Mrs. Merriweather then addressed the convention as follows:

Gentlemen of the Democratic convention: Time and again have the women of this country appeared before your legislative bodies and your great political conventions asking that the practice of this government be made to conform to its principles. The basic principle, the very foundations stones on which this government rests, are equal rights, yet now here in all this broad land do equal rights prevail? On the one side we have a privileged, a governing class; on the other side a subjected, a governed class. One half of the people of this so-called republic yet live in precisely the same political bondage our fore mothers lived in under the monarchs of England, before the colonies rebelled and seceded from the British empire. Our forefathers called themselves slaves because of such oppressions. If it were slavery for them, how is it not slavery for us? I have been deputed by the Missouri Woman's Suffrage society to come before you and ask you to recognize these just principles, and to pledge your party to right these great wrongs by procuring such an amendment to the constitution as will give to woman equal civil and political rights with men, including the right preservative of all rights— the right of suffrage. The Republican party claims and wears a crown of glory for giving freedom to four millions of negro slaves. How much more glorious a crown will that party win and wear that shall achieve the freedom of the educated Christian women of this country? You may have the opportunity to become the champion of freedom for the whole, instead of half the people. A declaration so noble, so grand, coming from this great body of Democratic men, will send a thrill through humanity's great heart, such as it never felt since time began, and will carry the memory of this convention to the very end of time itself.

Mrs. Merriweather then read a series of resolutions on woman's rights, which she would like to see adopted by the convention.

Considerable disorder prevailed during the delivery of Mrs. Merriweather's remarks, and the chair was obliged to remind the delegates of their discourtesy.

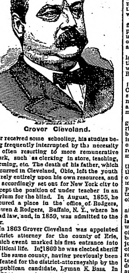
THE NOMINATION OF CLEVELAND.

Daniel Dougherty, of New York, presented the name of Grover Cleveland as the candidate of the democratic party for president, and his eloquent speech produced much applause, as also did the speech of Mr. McKenzie of Kentucky, who seconded Dougherty's motion.

H. D. D. Twiggs of Georgia also seconded Mr. Cleveland's nomination, as did also delegates from other states. Mr. McKenzie of Kentucky then moved to suspend the rules and to nominate Grover Cleveland for president by acclamation, which motion prevailed, and after a motion to take a recess until night had been voted down, the convention amid great confusion adjourned until next day.

SKETCH OF THE NOMINEE.

Grover Cleveland, twenty-second president of the United States, was born in Caldwell, Essex county, New Jersey, March 18, 1837. When three years of age his father, a Presbyterian minister, moved to Fayetteville, Onondaga county, N. Y., where young Grover received some schooling, his studies being frequently interrupted by the necessity of often resorting to more remunerative work, such as clerking in store, teaching, farming, etc. The death of his father, which occurred in Cleveland, Ohio, left the youth to rely entirely upon his own resources, and he accordingly set out for New York city to accept the position of under teacher in an asylum for the blind. In August, 1855, he secured a place in the office of Rodgers, Bowen & Rodgers, Buffalo, N. Y., where he read law, and, in 1859, was admitted to the bar.



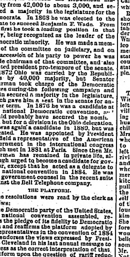
Grover Cleveland.

In 1863 Grover Cleveland was appointed district attorney for the county of Erie, which event marked his first entrance into political life. In 1869 he was elected sheriff of the same county, having previously been defeated for the district-attorneyship by the Republican candidate, Lyman K. Bass. In 1881 he was elected mayor of Buffalo on a combination Democratic and reform ticket. When a successor was to be elected to Gov. A. B. Cornell the Democrats nominated Grover Cleveland. Owing to an implacable and fatal division between the two leading factions of the Republican party in the State of New York, he was elected over Secretary Folger by the surprising majority of 192,000. In view of this impetus given to his political fortunes he was in 1884 nominated for president against James G. Blaine, and on March 4, 1885, inaugurated president of the United States. President Cleveland married in the White House on the second day of June, 1886, Frances Folsom, daughter of his deceased friend and partner, Oscar Folsom, of the Buffalo bar. Except the wife of Madison, Mrs. Cleveland is the youngest of the many mistresses of the White House, having been born in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1864.

THURMAN FOR VICE PRESIDENT.

As was known on the third day of the convention Allen Thurman, of Ohio, was nominated for vice President, with scarcely any opposition at all, Gray and Black having received a few complimentary votes.

Allen G. Thurman was born at Lynchburg, Va., Nov. 13, 1813. He removed to Ohio in 1819, and received an academic education and studied law under his uncle, William Allen, then senator, and afterward governor of Ohio, and with Noah H. Swayne, afterward a justice of the United States supreme court. While he studied law young Thurman also gave much of his time to land surveying. In 1844 he was sent to congress by the Democrats. During his service in that position Mr. Thurman advocated and voted for the "Wilmot proviso," and opposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise. After one term in congress he returned to his profession, declining a renomination. He remained at the bar in growing practice until 1851, when he was elected to the supreme bench of Ohio. From December, 1854, to February, 1856, he served as chief justice, and on the expiration of his term refused a renomination. In 1867 Mr. Thurman was nominated for governor by the Democrats, and, although defeated, he reduced the Republican majority from 42,000 to about 3,000, and secured a majority in the legislature for the Democrats. In 1868 he was elected to the senate to succeed Benjamin F. Wade. From the first he took a leading position in that body, being recognized as the leader of the Democratic minority. He was made a member of the committee on judiciary, and on the accession of his party to power he was made chairman of that committee, and also elected president pro-tempore of the senate. In 1872 Ohio was carried by the Republicans by 40,000 majority, but Senator Thurman took charge of the Democratic forces during the following campaign and again secured a majority in the legislature, which gave him a seat in the senate for another term. In 1876 he was a candidate at the national Democratic convention, and would probably have secured the nomination but for a division in the Ohio delegation. He was again a candidate in 1880, but was defeated. He was appointed by President Garfield a representative of the American government in the international congress which met in 1881 at Paris. Since then Mr. Thurman has remained in private life, although urged to become a candidate for governor, except that he acted as a delegate to the national convention in 1884. He was also government counsel in the recent suits against the Bell Telephone company.



THE PLATFORM.

The resolutions were read by the clerk as follows:

The Democratic party of the United States, in national convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives in the convention of 1884 and endorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last annual message to congress as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the question of tariff reduction; and also endorses the efforts of our Democratic representatives in congress to secure a reduction of excessive taxation.

Chief among its principles of party faith are the maintenance of an indissoluble union of free and indestructible states, now about to enter upon its second century of unexampled progress and renown, devoted to a plan of government regulated by a written constitution strictly specifying every granted power and expressly reserving to the states or people the entire ungranted residue of power; the encouragement of a jealous popular vigilance, directed to all who have been chosen for brief terms to enact and execute the laws, and are charged with the duty of preserving peace, ensuring equality and establishing justice.

The Democratic party welcome an exacting scrutiny of the administration of the executive power, which, four years ago, was committed to its trust in the election of Grover Cleveland, president of the United States, but it challenges the most searching inquiry concerning its fidelity and devotion to the pledges which then invited the suffrages of the people. During a most critical period of our financial affairs, resulting from overtaxation, the anomalous condition of our currency, and a public debt unmatured, it has, by the adoption of a wise and conservative course, not only averted a disaster, but greatly promoted the prosperity of the people.

It has reversed the improvident and unwise policy of the Republican party touching the public domain, and has reclaimed from corporations and syndicates alien and domestic, and restored to the people nearly one hundred millions of acres of valuable land to be sacredly held as homesteads for our citizens.

While carefully guarding the interest in the principles of justice and equity, it has paid out more for pensions and bounties to the soldiers and sailors of the republic than was ever paid before during an equal period.

It has adopted, and consistently pursued a firm and prudent foreign policy, preserving peace with all nations, while scrupulously maintaining all the rights and interests of our own government and people at home and abroad.

The exclusion from our shores of Chinese laborers has been effectually secured under the provision of a treaty, the operation of which has been postponed by the action of a Republican majority in the senate.

Honest reform in the civil service has been inaugurated and maintained by President Cleveland, and he has brought the public service to the highest standard of efficiency, not only by rule and precept, but by the example of his own untiring and unselfish administration of public affairs.

In every branch and department of the government under Democratic control, the rights and the welfare of all the people have been guarded and defended; every public interest has been protected, and the equality of all our citizens before the law, without regard to race or color, has been steadfastly maintained.

Upon its record thus exhibited, and upon the pledge of a continuance to the people of the benefits of democracy, it asks a renewal of popular trust by the election of a chief magistrate who has been faithful, able and prudent. It invokes in addition to that trust the transfer also to the Democracy of the entire legislative power.

The Republican party, controlling the senate and resisting in both houses of congress a reformation of unjust and unequal tax laws, which have outlasted the necessities of war and are now undermining the abundance of a long peace, deny to the people equality before the law, and the fairness and the justice which are their right. Then the cry of American labor for a better share in the rewards of industry is stifled with false pretenses, enterprise is fettered and bound down to home markets, capital is discouraged with doubt, and unequal, unjust laws can neither be properly amended or repealed.

The Democratic party will continue, with all the power confided to it, the struggle to reform these laws, in accordance with the pledges of its last platform, endorsed at the ballot box by the suffrages of the people. Of all the industrious freemen of our land, the immense majority, including every tiller of the soil, gain no advantage from excessive tax laws, but the price of nearly everything they buy is increased by the favoritism of an unequal system of tax legislation. All unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation.

It is repugnant to the creed of Democracy that by such taxation the cost of the necessaries of life should be unjustifiably increased to all our people. Judged by Democratic principles, the interests of the people are betrayed when, by unnecessary taxation, trusts and combinations are permitted to exist, which, while unduly enriching the few that combine, rob the body of our citizens by depriving them of the benefits of natural competition. Every democratic rule of governmental action is violated, when, through unnecessary taxation, a vast sum of money, far beyond the needs of an economical administration is drawn from the people and the channels of trade and accumulated as a demoralizing surplus in the national treasury. The money now lying idle in the federal treasury, resulting from superfluous taxation, amounts to more than $125,000,000, and the surplus collected is reaching he sum of more than $60,000,000 annually. Debauched by this immense temptation, the remedy of the Republican party is to meet and exhaust by extravagant appropriations and expenses, whether constitutional or not, the accumulation of extravagant taxation. The Democratic policy is to enforce frugality in public expense and abolish unnecessary taxation.

Our established domestic industries and enterprises should not, and need not, be endangered by the reduction and correction of the burdens of taxation. On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operations. In the interests of American labor, which should in no event be neglected, the revision of our tax laws contemplated by the Democratic party should promote the advantage of such labor by cheapening the cost of necessaries of life in the home of every working man, and at the same time securing to him steady and remunerative employment.

Upon this question of tariff reform, so closely concerning every phase of our national life, and upon every question involved in the problem of good government, the Democratic party submits its principles and professions to the intelligent suffrages of the American people.

THE REPORT ADOPTED.

Mr. Watterson then moved the previous question, and the report was adopted. He then said:

The platform committee has approved the report, and request to be passed without discussion three resolutions. The first of these will be presented by the Hon. W. L. Scott of Pennsylvania, and is as follows:

Resolved, That this convention hereby endorses and recommends the early passage of the bill for the reduction of the revenue now pending in the house of representatives.

The previous question was ordered and the resolution adopted. Frederick Lamon of Calafornia then presented the following, which was also adopted:

Resolved, That a just and liberal policy should be pursued in reference to the territories; that the right of self-government is inherent in the people, and guaranteed under the constitution; that the Territories of Washington, Dakota, Montana and New Mexico are by virtue of population and development entitled to admission into the Union as states, and we unqualifiedly condemn the course of the Republican party in refusing statehood and self-government to their people.

Murder and Suicide.

The wife of George Herkimer of Eau Claire, Wis., proprietor of a knit goods factory, left her husband and went to Fairchild, a village thirty miles from Eau Claire, taking her baby with her. She claimed her husband did not provide for her and the child, and she took refuge with her sister, Mrs. Thompson of Fairchild. Herkimer, who remained at Eau Claire was observed to be in an excited condition. He left on the noon train for Fairchild. Arriving there, he went to Thompson's house and insisted on seeing Mrs. Herkimer, who finally consented to talk with Herkimer in the kitchen. No sooner had the kitchen door been closed than Herkimer pulled a revolver, shot his wife in the breast, and immediately shot himself in the right temple. The occupants of the house rushed into the kitchen and found Herkimer stone dead and Mrs. Herkimer lying on the floor in a pool of blood. She is still alive. Herkimer had said before he left here that his wife's departure would drive him to desperation. He is believed to have been insane for some time. Mrs. Herkimer's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lee of Nottingham, England, had just come to America and were at the Thompson residence when the shooting occurred. Mr. Lee at first refused Herkimer admittance, but was overuled by the other. Herkimer was a middle-aged man, his wife several years younger than he. Mrs. Herkimer may recover.

There is much excitement all through Sussex county, N. J., over the bursting of the pipe line of the Standard Oil company. The lands of Henry Sammis, in Vernon township, are ruined. The oil has spread over acres of rich farm land and great damage had been done to growing crops. The soil is saturated and rendered useless by reason of being poisoned by the crude oil. Large quantities of oil have flowed into the streams and the fish are dying by hundreds. The fish commissioners are doing all in their power to avert the disaster that threatens the fish interests. Some maliciously disposed persons set fire to the oil and the Nackill r[illegible] bridge was nearly destroyed. The farmers will institute suits for damages against the Standard Oil company.

RESUME OF THE NEWS.

HORRIBLE CALAMITY.

Out of Thirteen Persons but Two Escape a Horrible Death by the Burning of the Mundine Hotel, Rockdale, Tex.

A most horrifying calamity has befallen Rockdale, Texas. The Mundine hotel, a three-story brick building, was found to be on fire, and was quickly all ablaze. Inside were thirteen persons, only two of whom escaped alive. Dr. H. A. Brooks, the proprietor, was pulled out of the burning building with his hair and beard singed off and otherwise badly burned, leaving behind him his wife and four children, who perished. Pemberton Pierce, representing the firm of George H. Zeigler, of Philadelphia, jumped from the burning building and was killed. D. M. Oldham of Dallas, representing the firm of F. Cannon & Co. of Galveston, escaped badly singed. The mystery about the thing is that so many should have perished when none were higher up than the second story, and there were galleries and exits on both sides of the building occupied by the sleepers. No one was heard to call or scream, all dying without a cry for help, though a great crowd quickly gathered, and exhausted every effort to afford a rescue. The remains of several have been recovered from the ruins, but they are unrecognizable. A great pall rests over Rockdale, and every business place is closed. Mr. Pierce is the only non-resident victim. The pecuniary loss is adout $15,000.

Those known to have been lost are: Mrs. W. A. Brooks, wife of the proprietor of the hotel and her four sons, aged four, six, nine and fifteen years respectively; J. F. Briscoe, wife and two little children; Isaac Crown, and a traveling salesman, supposed from papers to be Pemberton Pierce of Philadelphia. The hotel register being burned, there is nothing more with which to identify the remains. The origin of the fire is as yet a subject of conjecture. The postoffice was in the building and its contents were destroyed.

Minnesota Odd Fellows.

The grand lodge of Odd Fellows convened with about 250 delegates present coming from every part of the state. The report of the grand master showed 18 subordinate and 8 Rebekah degree lodges instituted during the year, five new halls dedicated and by-laws and amendments approved for about 20 lodges, etc. The report closes with a number of questions answered, recommendations to the lodges and mention of the deceased members. The secretary and treasurer's reports gave full details of all financial transactions of the order in the state. The following statistics show the condition of lodges in the state: Members in good standing Jan. 1, 1887, 6,471; increase by initation, 885; by deposit of card, 320; by re-instatement, 111; total, 7,787. Decrease by withdrawal, 337; by suspension for non-payment of dues, 410; deceased, 53; expelled, 11; total 811. Members in good standing Jan. 1, 1888, 6,976; net gain in membership, 505; number past grands, 1,400; number of brethers relieved, 467; number of widows relieved, 34; number of brothers buried, 50; number of weeks sickness for which benefits were paid, 2,463; whole number of charters issued in Minnesota, 139; number of delunct lodges, 10; number of working lodges June 1, 1888, 129; average membership per lodge. 59.

Mrs. Meckie L. Rawson, of Chicago, has, from appearances at least, thoroughly recovered from her slight indisposition. She has been informed that Attorney Henry C. Whitney was not fatally wounded and her condition has correspondingly improved. However, she still refuses to see any one until she has consulted fully with her attorneys. Mr. Whitney's condition was greatly improved, and strong hopes are entertained that he will be out and around as usual in a few days.

Aaron Pennock, a young Mennonite, became despondent at being pressed to pay a note due to a machine agent and hanged himself at Winnipeg.

At the session of the supreme court at Jefferson City Missouri Chief justice Norton fixed the day for the execution of Hugh M. Brooks, alias Maxwell, murderer of C. Aurthur Preller, for the 13th day of July. Executive clemency is all that can be hoped for by the doomed man's friends. Popular feeling is much opposed to executive clemency.

Forest fires are doing terrible havoc on the Omaha line about fourteen miles from Ashland. At Thirty-mile Siding the postoffice was destroyed, together with three houses, and that number of families are rendered homeless. Thirty cars, 5,000 ties and 3,000 posts were also consumed. The evening passenger train from St. Paul was delayed two hours. The passengers and crew aided in saving property and did effective work. Fears are entertained for other towns on the line, and it is thought that two or three workmen lost their lives.

The biggest scheme for furnishing shippers with a low rate has just been discovered in New York. The plan is to induce shippers on transcontinental lines to ship by lake instead of by rail, which makes a difference of 10 to 15 per cent in rates. The cheapest route being urged to shippers is by lake and rail to Duluth, thence via St. Paul, by which route a rate of 60 cents is given, which, added to the local rate of $2.80 from the latter point, gives a through rate of $3.40 to San Francisco. The all rail rate is $4 per 100 pounds, $1 of which goes to lines East of Chicago on dry goods to San Francisco. A number of large houses are already shipping in this way and San Francisco merchants are beginning to inquire earnest into the matter.

White Swan, chief of the Two Kettle band of Sioux, was in Pierre D. T., and expressed great satisfaction with the white father over the terms of the Dawes bill, and guarantees that every Indian on the reservation will sign the treaty. He was also well pleased with the prospect of having the Indian school at Pierre, and says that Carlisle is too far off, and that some teachers employed there do not know more than his son.

Isaac Orm, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., was sentenced by Judge Hoyt to one year in Waupun. A few days before he entered a saloon, and being refused drinks, as he was already drunk, he fired several shots which were intended for Thomas Dugan, but which took effect in the different parts of the room.

Max Hoppe, who murdered Adams near Fort Conrad, Montana, May 29, was captured by Deputy Sheriff Crawford, after a long and circuitous chase, near Sweet Grass Hills, about 150 miles north and across British lines. He is held by mounted police pending extradition proceedings. Hoppe claims he acted, in self-defense.

A farmer named Knudt Gullickson, residing about twenty miles southeast of La Grace, D. T., accompanied by a constable drove into town in search of his daughter who had been enticed from her home by P Larson, a married man and neighbor. The girl was under fifteen years of age a warrant was soon procured for the arrest of Larson. Larson and his victim are supposed to have passed through town during the night some two or three hours in advance of Gullickson and the constable. It is thought that Larson went to Washington Territory.

The body of John Olson Hague was found near his home in Grow, six miles from Anoka, Minn., at the foot of a small oak tree, with a rope around his neck. He was in a sitting posture, with his hands touching the ground, and leaning forward, with his head not two feet from the earth. Olson was forty years old, and leaves a wife and eight children. He recently lost his farm through drink, and his financial disasters were the probable cause. He reached home from Anoka the night before intoxicated and left his home early next morning, and must have hanged himself soon after, as decomposition had set in when the body was found.

A young man named Westey living at Hamilton, Fillmore county, Minn., was kicked to death by a vicious horse. A boy twenty years old named Engebretson, residing at Carimona, same county, while sitting on the door step handling a revolver accidently shot himself, the ball passing through his heart and killing him instantly.

An attempt was made to wreck a train on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad near Fulton, Ill., by placing two steel rails between the guard rails at the crossing of the Northwestern railway tracks. A freight southbound ran into them, the engine and sixteen cars going over all right, but the next two cars being derailed and torn to pieces.

Five of the riotous students of the agricultural college were arrested in Iowa by the sheriff of Story county and taken to Nevada for trial. This action has caused intense excitement among the anti-secret society students, who promptly raised a purse to defend their leaders. Some of the faculty sympathize with the anti-faction. President Chamberlain sustains the society men in their rights in accordance with usages in old colleges, and it is likely the trustees will sustain the president. The arrested obtained bail.

Chas. Schreeves, a hardware merchant of Murray, Iowa, killed Louis Mears, a farmer. Their quarrel grew out of Mears' objections to Schreeves paying attention to his sister. Mears dared Schreeves out to light. After they had been out a short time, Shreeves returned to town and sent a physician to Mears, who he said was hurt. Mears was brought home, where he died in a few minutes from the effects of thirteen stabs inflicted with a knife. Schreeves made no attempt to escape, and claimed he acted in self defense.

Considerable excitement was occassioned at Aberdeen, D. T., by the announcement that eight saloonkeepers and two druggists had been arrested for violations of the local option law in force in that city. The complaints were made by several parties employed, it is claimed, by the local option league to procure evidence. Saloon men who have been selling liquor for two months past under pretense of keeping pool rooms and temperance places, charge that various pretenses were used to procure drinks by informers. Threats of tar and feathers and violence are freely made against witnesses. Local optionists have employed attorneys and say they will see if the law of the territory shall be longer violated. In most cases the accused have waived examination and given bonds. A serious battle between whisk[illegible] and order is anticipated.

The coroner's jury in the Brown poisoning affair at Mason City, Io., made known their verdict which concludes as follows: The said jury upon their oath do say that the said Hiram L. Brown came to his death by taking arsenic, poison intentionally placed in his food or drink by some person unknown, but the said jury are led to suspect from the evidence before them that H. E. Brown is guilty of the deed." Matters are so complicated that no arrest will be made. The matter will be investigated again by the grand jury, which convenes in September. Mrs. H. E. Brown has left for her father's home in Wisconsin.

Hon. Peter Wright of Milwaukee, an attorney for the heirs of Maj. Hooe, U. S. A., who was well known to the early settlers of St. Paul, and who died at Prairie du Chien more than thirty years ago, has commenced legal proceedings on behalf of the heirs to recover for them property left by him at Prairie du Chien, Madison and other places. It seems that Maj. Hooe left his will giving all his property to his widow for life, with directions that at her death it should go to their children. She, however, overlooking the codditions of the will, made absolute conveyances, and the property for the most part being of small value at that early day, purchasers gave little attention to the question of title. The widow died a short time ago, and the heirs now seek to recover the property on the ground that her life interest having terminated they are entitled to it. The property involved in the claim is said to amount in value at present to about $200,000.

A tramp was picked up at Windom Minn., having in his possession fifteen watches, some of them gold, and all good; a handful of gold rings; three good revolvers, and a full set of burglar's keys. He refused to give his name, saying his friend's were too respectable. When called on to surrender he said he would die first, and made motions to draw his revolver. The sheriff was too quick for him, and said, "Die it is then," when the tramp wilted. He was taken immediately where court is in session, and he can have justice without delay.

Returns from all parts of the state of Oregon accessible by telegraph indicate that Hermann (Republican) for congress, has over 2,060 majority. His majority in Multnomah county, which includes Portland, is 2,500. The Prohibition vote is very small. There are Republican gains in every county in the state. The Democrats carry only two counties in the western half of the state. It is the largest Republican majority since the close of the war, and is astonishing alike to Republicans and Democrats. Still more surprising is the result in the returns for members of the legislature. There are 90 members in both houses. Of these the Republicans will have about 66 and the Democrats 24.

The secretary of the treasury transmitted to congress a modified estimate from the secretary of war of an appropriation for the erection of the barracks at Fort Snelling. The secretary says that as it is proposed to increase the garrison, it is recommended that the appropriation first proposed, $65,000, be increased to $150,000, which will also cover the cost of necessary apparatus for heating and lighting the barracks.

Rev. J. Henry Long, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Currie, Minn., was arrested for riding his bicycle on the street. This is the second arrest of the kind that has been made since the law makers of the village of Tracy got together and enacted the law prohibiting the riding of bicycles on the public streets.

The trial of Diss De Bar is in progress in New York. The first witness was the "general's" legal wife, who testified to that fact. Lawyer Marsh testified at length as to the production of spirit pictures by the madame, her slate writing and her calling up of the spirits of Raphael and others, with whom the witness conversed from time to time. As the witness testified concerning the production of portraits of Adelaide Neilson, Lola Montez, Yaphael Cadmus, etc., they were produced for the inspection of the jury.

Elections were held throughout Illinois for judges of the supreme court. The returns, which are nearly all in, show that the republican candidates, David J. Baker, Jacob W. Wilkin, Joseph M. Bailey and Benjamin Magruder were elected in the First, Third, Sixth and Seventh districts, and John M. Schoolfield, a democrat, the present incumbent, in the Second district. This makes the supreme bench of Illinois republican for the first time in its history.

Walter, the 5-year-old son of John Montgomery, died at Lake City, Minn., of pneumonia, which it is thought set in from the effects of being struck on the head and spinal column several times with an iron bar in the hands of the six-year-old son of Brad Rogers.

The large flouring mill of J. Schemek, of Blue Earth city, was totally destroyed by fire. There were about 4,000 bushels of wheat in the building and it was utterly impossible to save any of it. The loss is about $15,000, on which there is no insurance. The origin of the fire is unknown, but it is supposed to be due to an incendiary.

Some of the French settlers of Murray county have spent the winter in making straw hats and have placed them on the market.

An urgent call has been issued, signed by the members of the bar of the Fifteenth judicial district, asking Judge Sleeper to become a candidate at the coming election.

M. Frankoviz, a heavy hardware merchant, of Fergus Falls assigned to Anton Kaus. His liabilities are between $15,000 and $20,000; the assets more than sufficient in case the accounts can be collected. The cause was trusting out to much, and being forced to carry over farmers. Hibbard, Spencer & Co. of Chicago being the largest, their claim being $6,000. Frankoviz has wealthy friends, and it is possible matters may be fixed up.

The corner stone of the new $100 000 court house will be laid with appropriate ceremonies at Winona on June 28, under the auspices of the Masonic order. All the secret and civil societies will be invited to participate.

The large barn on Albert Smith's farm, about a mile east of St. Cloud, was completely burned. Besides the building, four horses, five sheep, a shepherd dog and a quantity of grain and machinery were burned. Loss about, $3,000. The fire is supposed to be of incendiary origin.

There have long been rumors of danger to the city of Brainard as to ultimate possession of its fine park, called Gregory square, which the city has long supposed it possessed as a bequest from the Lake Superior and Puget Sound Land company. Recently it has been rumored that the property had been listed for taxation as not owned by the city, and hence alarm, which culminates in action by the council to assert its rights. The city attorney has been formally instructed to examine the matter, and if necessary to commence action to quiet the title in the city.

An examination of applicants throughout Minnesota for admission to the training school of the Industrial Educational association of New York is to be held in St. Paul on June 14. The object of the school is to supply the demand for thoroughly equipped teachers of manual training.

D. C. Lester, dancing teacher of Duluth, opened a new hall and had issued invitations to members of the "Owl" and other clubs for a german. When the parties arrived at the hall it was dark and locked. Investigation proved that the "professor" had taken his trunk away and had probably skipped town.

Mr. Edward Crether, of the Diamond flouring mill at Lake Crystal met with a serious and probably fatal accident. When throwing off the belt from the fly-wheel the belt became wound around his feet drawing him into the wheel and crushing his right leg in a fearful manner. The fly-wheel stands about four feet from the engine, upon which he was thrown cutting the skull over the right eye and making a scalp wound on the left side of the head above the temple. It is thought that his brain has been injured by the fracture of the skull, and but little hope is entertained of his recovery. Quite a large piece of one the bones of his leg was found in the well.

When William Erwin of Duluth a laborer, working at West Superior, came home from work he found George Wilson in his wife's room with her. Wilson and Mrs. Erwin were both under the influence of liquor. Erwin attacked Wilson, and a bloody fight followed. Wilson's head was cut open in five places with the handle of a hammer, and Erwin had three wounds on his head. All of them were scalp wounds.

A mail bag was stolen from the depot platform at Willmar, Minn. John Lawler went down to Foot lake and observed something in the lake resembling brass. He became curious, investigated, and found it to be a mail bag, which had been sunk. It was cut open and three letters were found. It is supposed that some hangers-on snatched the bag after it was thrown off the west-bound night passenger and sneaked off through the woods down to the lake shore, which is a little way from the depot.

Notice to leave has been received by the people living on the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservations in Dakota. The secretary of war signed the order, and the Indian police are serving notice on settlers that they must vacate within a few days or the whole Indian force will confiscate their cattle, of which there are a large number, and convey the settlers to the fort.

TALMAGE'S SERMON.

The Brooklyn Preacher Discourses on the Divine Assassination and Its Lesson.

He Pictures a Cross Flaming with Suffering, Flaming with Triumph, Flaming with Glory.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., took for his text the passage:

Whosoever doth not bear His cross and come after me can not be my disciple. Luke xiv., 4-27.

He preached the following sermon:

The cross was a gibbet on which criminals were put to death. It was sometimes made in the shape of the letter T, sometimes in the shape of the letter X, sometimes in the shape of the letter I—a simple upright; sometimes two cross pieces against the perpendicular bar, so that upon the lower cross piece the criminal partially sat. But whatever style of cross always disgraceful, always agonizing.

When Darius conquered Babylon he put two hundred captives to death on the cross. When Alexander conquered Tyre he put two thousand captives to death on the cross. So it was just an ordinary mode of punishment. But in all the forest of crosses on the hills and in the valleys of the earth there is one cross that attracts more attention than any other. It is not higher than the others, it is not made out of different wood, there is nothing peculiar in the notch at which the two pieces are joined, and as to the scene, they witnessed crucifixions every few weeks so that I see a reckless man walking the hill and kicking carelessly aside a skull, and wondering who the villain was who had so flat and misshapen a head; and here is another skull, and there on the hillside is another skull. Indeed the Bible says it was "a place of skulls." But about the victim on one of these crosses all ages are crying: "Who is He? Was He a man? Was He a God?" Was He man and God?"

Through the darkness of that gloomy day I come close up enough to the cross to see who it is. It is Jesus. How did He come there? Had He come up on the hill to look off upon the beautiful landscape or upon a brilliant sunset? No. He came there ill and exhausted. People sometimes wonder why Christ expired so quickly on the cross, in six or seven hours, while other victims have been on the cross for forty-eight hours before life was extinct. I will tell you the reason. He was exhausted when he came there. He had been scourged. We are horrified at the cruelties of the whipping-post, but those cruelties were mercy as compared with the scourging of Jesus Christ.

I saw at Antwerp a picture made by Rubens—Rubens' picture of the scourging of Jesus Christ. It was the most overmastering picture I ever looked at, or ever expect to see. As the long-frocked official opened the door that hid the picture there He was—Christ with back bent and bared. The flagellator stood with the upper teeth clinched over the lower lip, as though to give violence to the blows. There were the swollen shoulders of Christ. There were the black and blue ridges, denied even the relief of bleeding. There was the flesh adhering to the whips as they were lifted. There were the marks where the knots in the whips gouged out the flesh. There stood the persecutor, with his foot on the calf of the leg of the Savior, balancing himself. Oh, the furious and hellish look on those faces, grinning vengeance against the Son of God. The picture seized me, it overwhelmed me; it seemed as if it would kill me. I do not think I could have looked at it five minutes and have lived.

But that, my friends, was before Christ had started for Calvary. That was only the whipping. Are you ready for the journey to the cross?

The carpenters have split the timber into two pieces. They are heavy and they are long pieces, for one of them must be fastened deep down in the earth lest the struggling of the victim upset the structure. They put this timber on the shoulder of Christ very gradually first, to see whether He can stand it, and after they find He can stand it, they put the whole weight upon Him. Forward, now, to Calvary. The hooting and the yelling mob follow on. Under the weight of the cross, Christ being weary and sick, He stumbles and falls, and they jerk at his robe indignant that He should have stumbled and fallen, and they cry: "Get up, get up!" Christ, putting one hand on the ground and the other hand on the cross, rises, looking into the face of Mary, His mother, for sympathy, but they tell her to stand back, it is no place for a woman—"stand back and stop this crying."

Christ moves on with His burden upon His shoulders, and there is a boy that passes along with Him, a boy holding a mallet and a few nails. I wonder what they are for. Christ moves on until the burden is so great He staggers and falls flat into the dust and faints dead away, and a ruffian puts His foot on Him and shakes Him as he would a dead dog, while another ruffian looks down at Him, wondering whether He has fainted away or whether He is only pretending to faint away, and with jeer and contempt indescribable says: "Fainted, have you? Fainted! Get up, get on!"

Now they have arrived at the foot of the hill. Off with His clothes. Shall that loathsome mob look upon the unrobed body of Christ? Yes. The commanding officers say: "Unfasten the girdle, take off the coat, strip Him." The work is done. Bring back the coat, for here are the gamblers tossing up coin on the ground, saying: "Who shall have the coat?" One ruffian says: "I have it, I have it—it is mine!" He rolls it up and puts it under his arm, or he examines it to see what kind of fabric it is made of. Then they put the cross upon the ground, and they stretch Christ upon it, and four or five men hold Him down while they drive the spikes home: at every thump a groan, a groan! Alas, alas! the hour passes on and the time comes when they must crucify Him.

Christ has only one garment left now, a cap, a cap of thorns. No danger that it will fall off, for the sharp edges have punctured the temples and it is sure and fast. One ruffian takes hold of one end of the short beam of the cross, and another ruffian takes hold of the other end of the short beam of the cross, and another ruffian puts his arms around the waist of Christ, and another ruffian takes hold of the end of the long beam of the cross, and all together they move on until they come to the hole digged in the earth, and with awful plunge it jars down with its burden of woe. It is not the picture of a Christ, it is not the statue of Christ, as you sometimes see in a cathedral; but it is the body of a bleeding, living, dying Christ.

They sometimes say He had five wounds, but they have counted wrong. Two wounds for the hands, two wounds for the feet, one wound for the side, they say, five wounds. No they have missed the worst and they have missed the most. Did you ever see the bramble out of which that crown of thorns was made? I saw one on a Brooklyn ferry-boat, in the hands of a gentleman who had just returned from Palestine, a bramble just like that out of which the crown of thorns was made. O how cruel and how stubborn were the thorns! And when that cap of thorns was put upon Christ it was pressed down on Him, not five wounds but ten, twenty, thirty—I can not count them.

There were three or four absences that made that scene worse. First there was the absence of water. The climate was hot; the fever, the inflammation, the nervous prostration, the gangrene had seized upon Him, and He terribly wanted water. His wounds were worse than gunshot fractures, and yet no water. A Turk in the thirteenth century was crucified on the banks of a river so that the sight of the water might tantalize him. And O how the thirst of Christ must have tantalized as He thought of the Euphrates and the Jordan and the Amazon and all the fountains of earth and heaven poured out of His own hand! They offered Him an intoxicating draught made out of wine and myrrh, but He declined it. He wanted to die sober. No water.

Then, my friends, there was the absence of light. Darkness always exasperates trouble. I never shall forget the night in the summer of 1873, in the steamer Greece, mid-Atlantic, every moment expecting the steamer to go down. All the lights in the cabin were blown out. The captain came crawling on his hands and knees, for he could not stand upright, so violently was the vessel pitching, and he cried out: Light up, light up!" The steward said: "We can't light up; the candles are gone and the holders are gone." The captain said: "I can't help that; light up!" The storm was awful when the lights were burning, worse when the lights went out.

Then there was the absence of faithful nurses. When you are ill it is pleasant to have the head bathed and the hands and feet rubbed. Look at the hands and feet of Christ! Look at the face of Christ. There were women there who had cared for the sick, but none of them might come up near enough to help. There was Christ's mother, but she might not come up near enough to help. They said: "Stand back! stand back! This is no place for you." The high priests and the soldiers wanted it their own way; they had it their own way.

The hours pass on, and it is 12 o'clock of Savior's suffering, and it is 1 o'clock, and it is 2 o'clock, and it is almost 3 o'clock. Take the last look at that suffering face; wan and pinched, the purple lips drawn back against the teeth, the eyes red with weeping and sunken as though grief had pushed them back, blackness under the lower lid, the whole body adroop and shivering with the last chill, the breath growing feebler, and feebler, and feebler, and feebler until He gives one long, deep, last sigh. He is dead! He is dead!

O, my soul, He is dead! Can you tell why? Was He a fanatic dying for a principle that He did not amount to anything? Was He a man infatuated? No; to save your soul from sin, and mine, and make eternal life possible He died. There had to be a substitute for sin. Who shall it be? "Let it be me!" said Christ. "Let it be me." You understand the meaning of that word substitution. You were drafted for the last war, some one took your place, marched your march, suffered your wounds, and died at Gettysburg. Christ comes to us while we are fighting our battle with sin and death and hell, and He is our substitute. He marches our march, fights our battle, suffers our wounds, and dies our death. Substitution! Substitution!

How do you feel in regard to that scene described in the text and in the region around about the text? Are your sympathies aroused or are you so dead in sin and so abandoned by reason of your transgressions that you can look upon all that tearless and unmoved? No, no; there are thousands of people here this morning who can say, in the depths of their soul: "No, no, no; if Jesus endured that and all that for me, I ought to love Him. I must love Him; I will love Him; I do love Him. Here, Lord, I give myself to Thee; 'tis all that I can do."

But how are you going to test your love and test your earnestness? My text gives a test. It says that while Christ carried a cross for you, you must be willing to carry a cross for Christ. "Well," you say, "I never could understand that. There are no crosses to be carried in this land; those persecutions have passed, and in all the land there is no one to be crucified, and yet in the pulpit and in the prayer-meetings you all keep talking about carrying a cross. What do you mean, sir?" I mean this: That is a cross which Christ calls you to do which is unpleasant and hard. "Oh!" you say, "after hearing the story of this Christ and all that He has endured for me I am ready to do anything for Him. Just tell me what I have to do and I'll do it. I am ready to carry any cross."

Suppose I should ask you at the close of a religious service to rise up announcing yourself on the Lord's side—could you do it? "Oh, no!" you say, "I have a shrinking and a sensitive nature, and it would be impossible for me to rise before a large assemblage, announcing myself on the Lord's side." Just as I feared. You cannot stand that cross. The first one that is offered you, you reject. Christ carried a Himalaya, Christ carried a world for you, and you can not lift an ounce for him.

But here is a man whose cross will be to announce among his business associates to-morrow morning on exchange that he has begun a new life, that, while he wants to be faithful in his worldly duties, he is living for another world, and he ought to advise all of his associates, so far as he can influence them, to begin with the Christian life. Could you do that, my brother? "Oh, no," you say, "not just that. I think religion is religion, and business is business, and it would be impossible for me to recommend the Christian religion in places of worldly business." Just as I feared. There is a second cross offered you and you cannot carry it. Christ lifted a mountain for you and you cannot lift an ounce for Him.

There is someone whose cross it will be to present religion in the home circle. Would you dare to kneel down and pray if your brother and sister were looking at you? Could you ask a blessing at the tea table? Could you take the Bible, and gather your family around you and read of Christ and heaven and your immortal soul? Could you then kneel and pray for a blessing on your household? "Oh," you say, "not exactly that. I couldn't quite do that, because I have a very quick temper, and if I professed religion and tried to talk religion in my household and after that I should lose my temper, they would scoff at me and say: 'You are a pretty Christian!'" So you are cowed down and their sarcasm keeps you out of heaven and away from Christ, when under God you ought to take away your whole family into the kingdom. Christ lifted a mountain, lifted a whole world for you; you can not lift an ounce for Him. I see how it is; you want to be favorable to religion, you want to support Christian institutions, you like to be associated with those who love the Lord Jesus Christ; but as to taking a positive step on this subject you can not—you can not, and my text, like a gate of a hundred bolts, bars you away from peace on earth and glory in heaven.

There are hundreds of men and women here, brave enough in other things in life, who simply for the lack of manliness stay away from God. They dare not say: "Forever and forever, Lord Jesus, I take Thee. Thou hast redeemed me by Thy blood, here is my immortal spirit. Listen, all my friends. Listen, all the world." They are lurking around about the kingdom of God—they are lurking around about it, expecting to crawl in some time when nobody is looking, forgetful of the tremendous words of my text: "Whosoever doth not bear His cross and come after Me cannot be My disciple."

An officer of a neighboring church told me that he was in a store in New York—just happened in—where there were many clerks, and a gentleman came in and said to a young man standing behind the counter: "Are you the young man that arose the other night in the Brooklyn tabernacle and asked for prayer?" Without any flush of cheek he replied: "I am. I haven't always done right, and I have been quite bad; but since I arose for prayers I think I am better than I was." It was only his way of announcing that he had started for the higher life. God will not cast out a man who is brave enough to take a step ahead like that.

I tell you these things this morning because, my dear friends, I want to show you how light the cross is that we have to carry compared with that which Christ carried for us. You have not had the flesh torn off for Christ's sake in carrying your cross. He fainted dead away under His cross. You have not carried the cross until it fetched the blood. Under His there was a pool of carnage that splashed the horses' fetlocks. You have friends to sympathize with you in carrying the cross. Christ trod the wine-press of God's wrath alone, alone! The cross that you and I ought to carry represents only a few days or a few years of trial. The cross that Christ carried for us had compressed into it the agonies of eternity.

There has someone come here to-day whom you have not observed. He did not come through the front door; He did not come down any of these aisles; yet I know He is here. He is from the east, the far east. He comes with blistered foot, and with broken heart, and cheeks red not with health, but with blood from the temples. I take hold of His coat and I say: "It does not seem to fit Thee." "No," He says; "it is not mine; it is borrowed; it does not belong to Me now. For My vesture did they cast lots." And I say to Him: "Thine eyes are red as though from loss of sleep." He says: "Yes, the Son of man had not where to lay His head." And I touch the log on His back and I say: "Why carriest Thou this?" "Ah!" He says, "that is a cross I carry for thee and for the sins of the whole world. That is a cross. Fall into line, march on with me in this procession, take your smaller crosses and your lighter burdens and join me in this march to heaven." And we join that procession with our smaller crosses and our lighter burdens, and Christ looks back and He sees some are halting because they can not endure the shame or bear the burden, and with a voice which has in it majesty and omnipotence, He cries until all the earth trembles: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me can not be My disciple."

Oh, my brethren, my sisters—for I do not speak professionally; I speak as a brother would speak to a brother or sister—my brother, can you not bear a cross if at last you can wear a crown? Come now, let us divide off. Who is on the Lord's side? Who is ready to take his back upon the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world?

A Roman emperor said to a Greek architect: "You build me a coliseum, a grand coliseum of all the people, and I will make a great day of festival on your account." The Greek architect did his work, did it magnificently, planned the building, looked after its construction. The building was done. The day for opening arrived. In the coliseum were the emperor and the Greek architect. The emperor arose amid the plaudits of a vast assembly and said: "We have gathered here to-day to open this coliseum and to honor the Greek architect. It is a great day for the Roman empire. Let this building be prosperous, and let honor be put upon the Greek architect. Oh, we must have a festival to-day. Bring out those Christians and let us have them put to death at the mouth of the lions." The Christians were put into the center of the amphitheater. It was to be a great celebration in their destruction. Then the lions, hungry, and three-fourths starved, were let out from their dens in the side of the amphitheatre, and they came forth with mighty spring to destroy and rend the Christians, and all the galleries shouted: "Huzza! Huzza! Long live the emperor!" Then the Greek architect arose in one of the galleries and shouted until in the vast assemblage all heard him: "I, too, am a Christian!" and they seized him in their fury and flung him to the wild beasts, until his body, bleeding and dead, was tumbled over and over again in the dust of the amphitheater.

Could you have done that for Christ? Could you, in a vast assemblage, all of whom hated Christ, have said: "I am a 'Christian,'" or, "I want to be a Christian?" Would you have had the ten thousandth part of the enthusiasm and the courage of the Greek architect? Nay, I ask you another question: would you in an assemblage where they are nearly all Christians—in an assemblage a vast multitude of whom love Christ and are willing to live, and if need be to die, for Him—would you dare to say, "I am a Christian," or, "I want to be a Christian?" Would you say in the presence of the friends of Christ, as much as the Greek architect said in the presence of the enemies of Christ? Oh, are there not multitudes here this morning who are ready to say: "Let the world look on, let all the galleries of earth and heaven and hell, look on. I take Christ this day. Come applause or abuse, come sickness or health, come life or death, Christ now, Christ forever."

Are you for Christ; are you against Him? The destinies of eternity tremble in the balance. It seems as if the last day had come and we were gathered for the reckoning. "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him." What I say to one I say to all. What are you doing for Christ? What are you bearing for Christ?

Oh, Christian man! Oh, Christian woman! Have you any scars to show in this conflict? When a war is over the heroes have scars to show. One hero rolls back his sleeve and shows a gunshot fracture, or he pulls down the collar and shows where he was wounded in the neck. Another man says: "I have never had the use of my limb since I was wounded at that great battle." When the last day comes, when all our battles are over, will we have any wounds for Christ? Some have wounds for sin, wounds for the devil, wounds gotten in fighting on the wrong side. Have we wounds that we can show—wounds gotten in the battle for Christ and the truth? On that resurrection day Christ will have plenty of scars to show. Christ will stand there and show the scars on His brow, the scars on His hands, and the scars on His feet, and He will put aside the robe of His royalty and show the scar on His side, and all heaven will break down with emotion and gratitude in one great sob, and then in one great hosanna. Will you and I have any scars to show?

There will be Ignatius, on that day showing the mark of the paw and teeth of the lion that struck him down in the coliseum. There will be glorious John Huss showing just where on his foot the flames began on that day when his soul took wing of flame and soared up from Constance. There will be Hugh McKail ready to point to the mark on his neck where the ax struck him. There will be McMillan and Campbell and Freeman, the American missionaries, who, with their wives and children, were put to death in the awful massacre at Cawnpore, showing the place where the daggers of the Sepoys struck them. There will be the Waldenses, showing where their limbs were broken on the day when the Piedmont soldiery pitched them over the rocks. Will you and I have any wounds to show? Have we fought any battles for Christ? Oh, that we might all be enlightened for Christ, that we might all be willing to suffer for Christ, that we might all bear a cross for Christ.

When the Scottish chieftains wanted to raise an army, they would make a wooden cross, and then set it on fire, and carry it with other crosses they had through the mountains, through the highlands, and among the people; and as they waved the cross the people would gather to the standard and fight for Scotland. So to-day, I come out with the cross of the Son of God. It is a flaming cross—flaming with suffering, flaming with triumph, flaming with glory. I carry it out among all the people. Who will be on the Lord's side? Who will gather to the standard of Emmanuel? A cross, a cross, a cross! "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after Me, can not, can not be My disciple."

A Camel's Revenge.

An English traveller in the East gives the camel a very poor character. According to his account the creature is from first to last undomesticated and savage, rendered serviceable not by tameness but by stupidity.

One passion alone he posesses, namely revenge, in the carrying out of which he shows an unexpected degree of far-thoughted malice, united with all the cold stupidity of his usual character. One instance of this I well remember.

A lad of about fourteen had conducted a large camel, laden with wood, to another village at about half a mile's distance. As the animal loitered or turned out of the way, its driver struck it repeatedly, and harder than it seems to have thought he had a right to do. But finding the occasion favorable for taking immediate quits, it bode its time; nor was that time long in coming.

A few days later the same lad had to reconduct the beast, unladen, to his own village. When they were about half way on the road, and at some distance from any habitation, the camel suddenly stopped, looked deliberately around in every direction to assure itself that no one was within sight, and finding the road clear of passengers, made a step forward, seized the unlucky boy's head in its monstrous mouth, and lifting him into the air flung him down again with the upper part of his skull completely torn off.

Having thus satisfied its revenge, the brute quietly resumed its pace towards the village, as though nothing were the matter, till some men who had observed the whole proceedings, though unfortunately at too great a distance to be able to afford timely help, came up and killed it.

With Heads to the North.

The belief that human beings should sleep with their heads to the north is said to have its foundation in a scientific fact. The French Academy of Sciences has made experiments upon the body of a guillotined man which go to prove that each human system is in itself an electric battery, one electrode being represented by the head, the other by the feet. The body was taken immediately after death and placed on a pivot, to move as it might. After some vacillation the head portion turned toward the north, the body then remaining stationary. One of the professors turned it half way round, but it soon regained its original position, and the same result was repeatedly obtained until organic movement finally ceased.—Globe-Democrat.

The Largest Lens.

A $15,000 lighthouse lens made in Paris for the United States Government is now in Washington, D. C. It is the largest lantern lens in the country. The glasswork, or lens proper, measures 15 feet in height, while the internal diameter is 8 feet, 8 inches.

Burials Alive

Burials alive are far more common in hot countries, where the burial takes place within twenty-four hours after death, than they are here, says the London Referee, where one gets, as a rule, a week's grace. In Spain the body is frequently removed to the undertaker's shop a few hours after death. In one of the largest of these establishments in Madrid, some years ago, an extraordinary sight was witnessed. A gentleman was brought in his "casket" one afternoon, and placed in the room set apart for that branch of the business. The proprietor lived over his premises, and on this especial evening was given a grand ball. When the ball was in its height, a gentleman in full evening dress suddenly joined the company. He danced with the wife of the undertaker, and he danced with the undertaker's daughter, and seemed to be thoroughly enjoying himself. The undertaker thought he knew his face, but didn't like to be rude and ask him his name, but by and by all the guests departed and the strange gentleman was the only one left. "Shall I send for a cab for you?" said the host at last. "No, thank you," replied the gentleman, "I'm staying in the house." "Staying in the house!" exclaimed the undertaker; "who are you, sir?" "What, don't you know me? I'm the corpse that was brought in this afternoon."

The undertaker, horrified, rushed to the mortuary room and found the coffin empty. His wife and daughter had been dancing with a corpse. An explantion, of course, followed. The gentleman, who had only been in a trance, had suddenly recovered, and hearing music and revelry above, and having a keen sense of humor, had got out of his coffin (the Spanish coffin closes with a lid, which is only locked just previous to interment) and joined the festive party. He was quite presentable, as in Spain the dead are generally buried in full evening dress.

How W. J. Florence Was Saved.

Florence says the first practical joke that was ever played on him was the means of getting him out of a scrape, and he has felt kindly toward that form of wit ever since.

It was when he was a lad, playing minor comedy parts in a Broadway theatre at $10 a week. He thought he was madly in love with a young actress at work for the same stipend. During the play one night he invited her to take some oysters after the performance. Then he rushed to his lodgings, changed his clothes, met her and took her to an oyster house. His bill there was $1.90, but unfortunately he found he had left all his money in his other clothes. The waiter and the proprietor both said his story was too diaphanous, and made him give up his watch and his father's ring that he wore. Just then a white haired, benevolent looking old gentleman came out of one of the private dining compartments they used to have in those days, and thundered at the proprietor:

"Give that youth back his watch and chain and ring. Let me pay his bill. You ought to be ashamed, sir. Any one can see this is an honest youth and his companion is a perfect lady. (The lady was in tears,) I will pay the bill and never set foot in your place again."

"Give me your address sir," said he to the kindly old gentleman. "I will return you the money to-morrow."

"Oh, never mind, said the philanthropist; "that was a counterfeit $20 bill I handed to that old fool. It was worth nothing, and he gave me $18.10 change for it. That's the way I make my living. Good night."—New York Sun.

Two Stories of Congressman Pettigrew.

I heard two good stories to-day of Pettigrew, of South Carolina, the great lawyer and Unionist, which I had never heard before. He was practicing at one time before a judge who was a Presbyterian of the straightest sect and a very hard working officer. It came to be Maunday Thursday, and Pettigrew and the Episcopalians and Roman Catholics thought they would like an adjournment of court over Good Friday. Pettigrew was selected to make the motion. "Your honor," he said, "I desire to move that the court adjourn over to-morrow." "Why should the court adjourn over to-morrow, when the docket is so crowded?" asked the judge. "Because," said Pettigrew, "to-morrow is Good Friday, and some of us would like to go to church." "No," said the judge decidedly, after a moment's thought, "the court will sit to-morrow as usual." "Very well, your honor." replied Pettigrew, adding, as he turned away, "I know there is a precedent, for Pontius Pilate held court on the first Good Friday."

The same judge was a great stickler for etiquette, and when one hot July day Pettigrew came into the court room in a black coat and yellow nankeen trousers the judge took him sternly to task, asking him whether he did not know that the rules of that court required its counselors to appear in "black coat and trousers." "Well, your honor," said Pettigrew, innocently," I submit that I am within the rule, for I have on a black coat and trousers." "But they're not black trousers," insisted the judge; black coat and trousers means that both shall be black. "Then," said Pettigrew, "I call your honor's attention to the fact that the sheriff of this court is in contempt of its rules, for they require him to attend upon its sessions in a cocked hat and sword, and while his hat seems to be cocked his sword certainly is not." The judge said no more about the trousers.—Philadelphia Record.

JASPER BROWER.

THE CHARLES A. VOGELER CO., Baltimore, Md.

The severest wind and thunderstorm known for many years passed over Montreal, Canada, and did much damage. Much valuable timber was destroyed and many houses were blown down. At Compton the house of O. Perrault was demolished, and Perrault's wife and five young children were instantly killed. Several other disasters are reported from various points and it is feared the loss of life will be very heavy. It is feared the storm did much damage to vessels on the river and lower lakes, but no details can be obtained.

There was a sensational scene on Broadway, New York. Billy Deutsch, the well known sport and man-about-town, was whaled with an umbrella by Rose Mignon, a French actress. There was a big crowd of people on the street at the time, and the woman was arrested but discharged later. Deutsch is the man who broke the bank at Monaco some years ago when he won $250,000 at one sitting.

Every farmer living at any distance from a physician should at all times be prepared to treat such common but by no means simple complaints as diarrhœa, dysentery, cholera morbus, and cramps. The safest, surest, and quickest remedy for such disorders is PERRY DAVIS' PAIN KILLER.

Woman's Modesty.

Many women are prevented by feelings of delicacy from consulting a physician in those disorders arising from functional derangement of her peculiarly delicate organism, and the most serious results are often caused by this neglect. To such persons Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is an especial boon, as it offers a sure and safe cure for all those distressing disorders to which women are peculiarly subject, whilst it saves a modest girl or woman from the embarrassment of a personal consultation with a physician. "Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. See guarantee on bottle wrapper.

Symptoms of Catarrh.

Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak, watery, and inflamed; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a nasal twang; the breath is offensive; smell and taste are impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from Nasal Catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated, by physicians. Five hundred dollars reward is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of catarrh which they cannot cure. Remedy sold by druggists, at only 50 cents.

This preparation is so well balanced in its actions upon the alimentary canal, the liver, the kidneys, the stomach, the bowels and the circulation of the blood, that it brings about a healthy action of the entire human organism, restores the appetite, and overcomes that tired feeling.

A DUEL AT SUNRISE.

From the Atlanta Constitution.

I.

Hamp Harper calmly studied the note that was lying on the table before him. It had just been handed him by a small urchin who was then waiting out in the hall for an answer. Yawning wearily, and frowning slightly, he picked up a pen and wrote hastily the following answer:

> Mr. Bancroft: Your challenge, which is before me, is accepted. Will be on hand at the appointed time.
>
> HAMP HARPER.

"That fellow Bancroft is a miserable fool," mused Hamp, after the boy had departed with the note. "The idea of his challenging me to fight a duel, and all on account of Helene, too, when absolutely the girl would not give the snap of her finger for him. The most ridiculous part of the proceeding, however, is my accepting a challenge to fight a duel with a drunken vagabond, and on the ground, too, of rivals in love!" and Hamp Harper laughed heartily as the real situation flashed through his mind.

"I should have ignored the whole business," he said, meditatively. "However, I suppose that he has his heart set upon it, and our 'rivalry' must be settled on the field, or, more properly speaking, mountain of honor; for he has selected, I see," referring to the challenge, "at sunrise on the crest of Lone mountain!"

Hamp Harper was summering at the popular and romantic little summer resort of L——, in the state of Virginia, and had formed the acquaintance and fallen deeply in love with Helene Moncrief, a charming little brunette of probably eighteen summers, perhaps less, surely not more, who had been placed under the protecting care of Mrs. Lathrop, a middle-aged widow lady, who was at the time Helene was placed under her charge, engaged as assistant principal in the flourishing village school at L.

It seemed to be a genuine case of love at first sight, for Hamp had only known Helene three weeks, yet they had vowed eternal love and devotion, and looked forward with the utmost impatience and unspeakable pleasure to the day that should make them one.

By some unavoidable circumstance, James Bancroft had become acquainted with Helene, and, as she had told Hamp, it was a fatal mistake of Mrs. Lathrop asking him to come to see her, as he had made her life almost a burden since. To her surprise, when she appealed to that individual to use her influence in putting a stop to his visits, she flatly refused, and upbraided her for objecting to what she characterized the attentions of "so perfect a gentleman."

"But, guardie," Helene would say, "it isn't right, and besides, papa wouldn't like it, I am sure, did he know that a young man was forcing his attentions on me! So if you do not tell him to cease his visits, I am sure I will, and ask papa to take me away besides."

This threat had the desired effect finally, as Mrs. Lathrop had promised to comply with Helene's request the next time Bancroft came, which she did only a few days prior to the one upon which Hamp Harper had received the challenge.

"Dear, good guardie," Helene said, as she placed her arms around Mrs. Lathrop's neck and kissed her, "I knew that you would tell him when you found that I was so bitterly opposed to his visits. I can't bear the sight of that fellow!"

"I am fearful that you will live to regret it, Helene," answered Mrs. Lathrop, with a sigh. "James Bancroft is, in my estimation, a noble young man, even if he does drink to excess sometimes."

"I fail to see anything ennobling in him," replied Helene, frankly.

"Yes, I suppose so, but could you hear his story, as he told it to me, you would be more charitable in your opinion of him, I think."

Despite her efforts to the contrary, Helene evinced some sign of becoming interested, and asked, somewhat eagerly, though apparently very indifferently.

"Is it so interesting, guardie?"

"If you do not mind listening, I will tell you, Helene," said Mrs. Lathrop, slowly.

"I don't mind—tell me."

"Fifteen years ago," he said, "he and his father had a falling out, and he left home. He was just fifteen then, and left with the determination never to return. But two years ago a longing to see his old home again seized him and he started back. He had been in Devonshire, England, and had never had any news from his home since he left it.

"There were only three in the family—his father, himself and a little sister, who was only two and a half years old.

"Arriving at the old homestead, he found that they had moved away—gone, no one knew where—a few months after he left, and from that day to this he has wandered far and near—aimlessly roaming—hunting for all that he held dear, but his search had proved fruitless; not the least trace could be found of either his father or sister.

"After searching for a year he became despondent and took to drink. Never up to a year ago had he drank anything, but the thought that he separated from his father in anger, and now perhaps he was dead, preyed upon his mind to such an extent that he sought solace in drink.

"Since meeting you, however, he said that his better nature had prevailed, and that he had resolved to give up the cup, and ask me to please allow him to visit us, as he felt that he needed the good influences that your society seemed to throw around him.

"It was the sympathy that this story awakened in me that I allowed him to come at all, Helene, and if I have done wrong in so doing I hope that you will forgive me."

"Probably I was wrong, after all, guardie," said Helene, arising and extending her hand, "and if, as you say, my society will have any influence over his passion for drink, why, you can let him continue to visit us; but remember, I can be only a sister to him, for my heart is another's." And before Mrs. Lathrop had time to reply, Helene had left the room.

II.

Day was just dawning when Hamp Harper and Adolph Cumming took their seats on an overhanging craig on the top of Lone mountain. Hamp and his second had come, according to the agreement, to meet an adversary in what he trusted would be a harmless conflict; for in his heart he did not wish to kill James Bancroft, and on the other hand, he did not want to be killed. He had hopes even now, that an amicable agreement could be reached, and he had resolved upon a course in that direction. The first crimson streaks of the rising sun could be seen in the east when Adolph said:

"Isn't it about time for him to put in an appearance?"

"Yes, for it is only a few moments until sunrise now," answered Hamp.

"Suppose I discharge my pistol, and see if we can hear from him?" suggested Adolph.

"As you please," Hamp replied.

Acting upon this, Adolph discharged the weapon in the air, and simultaneously almost it was answered by a similar report from somewhere down the mountain.

"They are coming," spoke both men in the same breath, and it was even so, for just as the sun rose from behind the eastern horizon, James Bancroft, accompanied by a villainous looking fellow, rounded the craig upon which Harper and Cumming were sitting.

To Hamp's pleasant "Good morning, gentlemen," James Bancroft replied:

"It will be a bad morning for one of us, Hamp Harper. If it be me, all right; if you, then may your bones never grow blacker."

"Is there no other way to settle this affair, Mr. Bancroft?" ventured Hamp, determined to carry out his resolve in trying to bring about a reconciliation without resorting to the use of arms.

"None whatever, sir," answered Bancroft, with a contemptuous smile, evidently misinterpreting Hamp's meoning in asking the question.

"Then you are resolved upon this duel?"

"Yes, sir; nothing short of that will satisfy me."

"Mr. Cumming," said Hamp, "will you please step off twenty paces?"

That gentleman immediately measured the distance.

Hamp then stepped up to Bancroft, and extending his hand, said:

"Mr. Bancroft, I wish you well!"

Bancroft started perceptibly at this, and muttered something under his breath.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Cumming, "I will count three; at one you raise your weapons, at two you take aim, and at three you fire! Do you understand the arrangement?"

Both nodded affirmatively.

Bancroft's second was standing at a safe distance, trembling like an aspen.

A deathly stillness prevaded the whole mountain. The stillness was painful. Cumming took his stand midway between the duelists and in a steady, ringing voice, said:

"Gentleman, take your stands."

They both took their places.

A moment more of silence, and Cumming said, with slow, steady accents:

"One!"

"Two!"

"Three!"

There was a report as if one weapon had been discharged, but both men fell, Bancroft falling heavily as if he had been killed instantly, while Hamp Harper tottered, grasped at a limb for support, and sank gradually to the ground.

Cumming hurried over to Hamp to ascertain the extent of his hurt.

"Go to Bancroft," said Hamp quickly, "he is badly hurt. I think."

Upon examination it was found to be as Hamp had surmised. The ball had entered just below the left eye and came out behind the right ear. Looking around he called Bancroft's second, but he was nowhere to be seen. A thorough search failed to reveal him. He had gone immediately after the duelists had taken their stands, and was then perhaps a mile from the dueling ground.

"I am mortally wounded," said Bancroft feebly. "Go for Helene immediately; I want to see her once more before I die."

"But I can't leave you here by yourself," said Cumming.

"My second, where is he?"

"Gone," replied Cumming. "He left directly before the duel."

"The coward!"

"Come and assist me to rise, Cumming," said Hamp. "I'm able to wait on Bancroft; I'm only shot through the arm."

True to his word, Hamp proceeded to attend on Bancroft, getting him as comfortable as possible by putting his head on his coat, which he pulled off and folded up for him to use for a pillow.

Cumming started to L—— for assistance, with which he returned in an hour, consisting of two physicians, who after hurriedly examining Hamp's wound and finding it slight, turned their attention to Bancroft, who was moaning piteously. It took them only a moment to decide that his was fatal, and turning to Cumming said:

"He cannot possibly live more than an hour."

"Did Helene come?" feebly asked Bancroft.

"She will be here directly," answered Cumming, "accompanied by her father."

"Her father?"

"Yes. He came last night, and they are to leave for his home to-morrow."

"She will be too late," moaned Bancroft, "if she does not hurry, for I'm dying."

At that moment voices were heard a few feet away, when Helene, her father and Mrs. Lathrop were seen comming toward them.

They approached slowly until within a few feet of where Bancroft lay, and then Mr. Moncrief, taking a look at the deathly white face before him, gave a despairing scream and fell prostrate beside the dying man, exclaiming:

"My son! my long lost son!"

"My father!" gasped James Bancroft.

"Then—then—Helene—"

"Oh, my darling brother," cried Helene, throwing herself down by the side of Bancroft, and putting his head in her lap; "why didn't you tell me?"

"Because"— feebly—"I—I— didn't know it!"

"Oh, my boy! my boy!" moaned Mr. Moncrief, "how comes this?"

"God forgive me," answered Bancroft, "for I did not know, "but—I—was—in—love—with—my—sister!" he gave one last convulsive gasp and turned over in his sister Helene's lap, a corpse.

"But I do not understand," said Hamp, "how Helene Moncrief can be your daughter, while James Bancroft is your son?"

"I will explain. Directly after my son left me, fifteen years ago, I marrird again, my second wife living only six weeks. Her maiden name was Moncrief. She became greatly attached to little Helene, and on her dying bed requested that I let Helene take the name of Moncrief in lieu of Bancroft, and I consented. At three years of age I put her in Mrs. Lathrop's charge, under the name of Helene Moncrief, aud from that day until this moment Helene and myself have been known to her by the name of Moncrief."

James Bancroft was buried the next day at L——, a large crowd attending, and among the chief mourners at the grave was Hamp Harper. His grief was genuine and the sympathy of the whole village seemed to go out to him.

Six months after the events recorded above, Hamp Harper and Helene Bancroft were taking what was understood to be their last walk together, for the next day Helene was to accompany her father to his old home, where they hoped to forget the terrible ending of their son and brother. Though secretly, the young lovers were as deeply attached one to the other as ever, yet Hamp had never had the courage to mention his love for Helene since that terrible duel. Neither had spoken for several moments, both doubtless thinking of the parting on the morrow, an event to which Hamp could hardly look with anything like composure. Finally, as they turned to retrace their steps homeward, Hamp said:

"You leave L——to-morrow, Helene?"

"Yes, to-morrow," turning deathly pale.

"I am very sorry," said Hamp, a great lump rising in his throat.

To this Helene replied by turning her face in the opposite direction, and Hamp could not help noticing that a deathly pallor overspread her countenance, and taking courage from this, he suddenly broke out:

"Helene, can you, is it possible for you to look upon me in the future as anything but the brute that I am? God knows what I have suffered within the last six months! Had I known, had I ever suspicioned the truth, the whole world could not have induced me to meet Mr.—your brother—as I did! Oh, that it had been me! I would rather a thousand times over to have gone to the grave in his stead Oh, it is horrible, hor——"

"I—am—glad—it—was—not—you!" she sobbed, turning full upon him. Amid her weeping she continued: "Of course, it is horrible, Hamp, but in my heart I know that my poor dead brother was to blame, and, after all, Helene still loves you."

"Oh, heaven, do I deserve this?" and Hamp Harper looked to heaven for his answer.

Helene was silent, and seemed lost in deep study. Suddenly Hamp stopped, took her little hand in his and asked, eagerly:

"My precious Helene, do you love me, then, as well as before?"

"Yes, as I have always loved you!"

"Then you will be my little Helene?"

"Yes—if you want me."

Mr. Bancroft was very stern in his objections at first, but the pleadings of two bleeding hearts soon overcame them, and he finally yielded, then and there offering his benedictions upon them.

A few days before the wedding of Hamp and Helene, Mr. Bancroft surprised them one morning by saying:

"Well, children, Mrs. Lathrop and myself have decided that I will be too lonesome after Helene's marriage to live by myself, and the upshot of the decision is that we will keep you company on that day, provided there are no objections raised by you, for we decided to leave that with you two."

Of course there were no objections, and so the little village was treated to a double wedding a few days afterward, which was unanimously voted to be a very strange but happy termination of the terrible "Duel at Sunrise."

Women in the South.

American Magazine.

The mother was the power in every household; indeed, it was literally her home, very often her property. A New England tourist expressed to the writer his surprise at a discovery he had made in the towns he had visited. Said he: "It is always Mrs. A.'s, Mrs. B.'s house. I am invited to Mrs. C.'s house; I never hear of the husbands, house. I think I have found really the land of women's rights after all; men have offices, stores and plantation's but the women have the homes." And the management of this home included every detail of domestic life, as the mistress looked well to the ways of her household; from breakfast the guests were dismissed to the library, drawing room or outdoor sports, while with her own hands she washed the best china and silver before she rejoined them. The necessities of children, the wants of slaves, the requirements of visitors, the attention due her husband made her a guide, a counselor, a legislator in one—the wise matron who sees and improves opportunity, the gentle Portia whose judgment and affection save both Shylock and Antonio. So in no metaphor, but in plain prose was woman the vital breath of the Southern home. The idea so prevalent among many who ought to know better, that she neither desired, nor was capable of, greater mental effort than was demanded for the comprehension and enjoyment of a sensational novel, appears sufficiently absurd when we realize that the supposed reasons for self-indulgence were themselves the prime cause of ceaseless anxiety and unremitting care.

The Worm Will Turn.

Arizona Kicker.

Two weeks ago we had the pleasure of showing Steve Battle up to this community in his true light—that of a jail-breaker, incendiary, and robber. In revenge Steve waited for us in front of the widow Chilton's house the other night, where it is known we are doing a little courting with a view of matrimony, and as we reached the road he made a rush for us, crying out that he would have our life. We were taken unawares, knocked down and pounded until we couldn't holler. As a result, Steve Battle has been run out of town with a rail beneath him, and warned that he will be hung if he returns. We are able to be about again, and return our thanks to such friends as have sent in flowers, sausages, butter crackers, codfish, and other mementoes. We expected a dozen wallopings the first year of our stay, and will probably get 'em, as we have averaged one a month so far. The worm will turn some day, however, and then look out!

Where the Sea Foams.

M. Quad in Detroit Free Press.

There is something about old ocean which brings people to a common level and sends formality to the dogs. You will notice this at the seashore as well as on a big steamer. People seem to feel free with each other, and any dignity you put on must vanish at the first flow of the tide. I had not been in Red Bank above half an hour last year when a stranger came walking briskly up to me, held out his hand for a shake, and said:

"Never was so glad to see anyone in my life! If you hadn't come on the noon train I should have left at four o'clock."

"Indeed! And your name is—is—"

"Major Thomas Winfield Troy, of course. Here's my card. I'm awfully glad to see you. You are looking much better. How are all the folks? The clerk said you were looking for me. How kind in you to remember poor me! I suppose you have heard of my misfortune! It was stupid in me, I'll admit, but the best of us are sometimes absent-minded."

"Did—did something happened to you?"

"Ha! ha! ha! Pretty good that, being as it has been in all the papers and is the sole topic of the town! Didn't I go and put my wallet, in the pocket of my bathing suit, and didn't that wallet and its contents of $5,000 disappear in the surf. It would be a mere trifle to me at any other time, but just now—"

"And you lost $5,000?"

"Exactly $5,000."

"And you want me to lend you $25 to go home and get $5,000 more?"

"You've hit it exactly my dear old friend, and save me the embarrassment of an explanation. I will return in three days."

"Yes, but I can't let you have it."

"You can't!"

"No; I've only got $1.50, and there seems no chance of opening a faro game or robbing a bank. I was wondering as you came up if I could not work the three-card monte on you. Have you noticed any show for robbing the hotel or picking pockets?"

"Wh-what!" he gasped; "I—I thought—"

"That I was a visitor to the seashore. So I am. I come down here every season in search of boodle. but this year I am playing in hard luck. If you can raise the sugar we'll go up to Coney Island. Think there'd be any chance of robbing the Post-office here? Second class job, of course, but I'm hard up!"

"Say! I—" he began, but suddenly cut it in two, looked me all over and then turned and walked off. He evidently didn,t relish my dishonest countenance. He had six feet of plated watch chain hitched to his vest pockets, and perhaps he feared I would rob him.

Later in the day a tall, distinguished-looking gentleman in fine raiment, came out to me in the summer house. We talked of Europe, Asia, Africa, the Keely motor, the mosquitoes and other things for three long hours, when he suddenly said:

"Oh, by the way, I want to ask a slight favor of you. I drew on Jay Gould for $5,000 the other day, but find I shall be dead broke before the money comes. If you could spare me $75 or a hundred for about four days I shall be eternally obliged."

"Sorry, very sorrry, my friend. I am just going down to the bank myself to draw on Mr. Gould for $10,000. As it will be some time before the money comes I won't dare let go the few shillings I have in my pocket."

"You doubt me!" he exclaimed as he half rose up.

"Oh, no, sir; but our lay happens to be the same. I'm on the confidence racket myself."

"What!"

"Sure's shooting. I've got my eye on that old chap over in the corner, and if I can't wheedle him out of a hundred to-day or to-morrow I'm going to break into his room at night. Say, I believe there's boodle to be had in this town. If I can only find a man with nerve enough to cut a man's throat while I hold his arms, I believe—"

"Villain!" he hissed as he rose up.

"Oh, come off!"

"I want nothing to do with you!"

"Oh, you don't! Well, you can go your way, then. I don't chum with spring chickens. A man who is afraid of a little blood-letting to carry out a robbery or burglary had better turn to clothes-lines or hencoops. Good day, sir. I won't give you away, but don't come near me again."

Two days later a woman came to me in tears. She was a good-looking, well-dressed woman, which made it all the nicer. She had noticed my honest contenance from afar off, and had finally made up her mind to come to me with her story. She was a deserted bride. She had run away to marry the man she thought she loved, and in a week he had given her the cold shake. If she could borrow money to get home on it would be returned by telegraph. Had I a sister? If so she might be in the same unpleasant predicament some day. It was an awful thing to have to appe to a stranger, but she saw no other way.

When she got through I told her my story. I told her that my right name was the St. Louis Kid, and that I was hiding while a murder could blow over. I was a bank sneak, robber, burglar and confidence operator, but was just then in hard luck. While I couldn't give her any money I could advise with her. Why. not try pocket-picking? She had a hand just fitted for the work.

"You—you scoundrel!" she gasped at me.

"You ought to be in prison, sir!"

"Certainly, but I'm going to keep out as long as possible. Let's see, can you play poker?"

She rose up and flounced off, mad as a wet hen, and saying I ought to be horsewhipped; but two weeks later, as I wandered into court at Atlantic City one day, she was in the box charged with robbery. I caught her eye and signed for her not to give me away, and she signalled back that she wouldn't. I shall never forget her kindness.

Rev. Edward Morrisey, a Catholic priest who recently went to Lincoln, Neb., from Idaho, brought suit in the district court to recover $199 against Bishop Bonacum, of the diocese of Lincoln, to recompense him for expense and loss of time in coming. He alleges that he resigned his pastorate in Idaho at the suggestion of the bishop, who promised to give him a position in the moral vineyard in this diocese, but now refuses to keep his word.

The Country Editor's Lot.

"Yes," said the man who had been a country editor, with dreamy voice and eyes glazing reflectively on the ceiling. "yes, the life of a country editor has its attractions. It also has its drawbacks. I spent about a dozen years in a country printing office, beginning as a devil and gradually drifting downward until I became editor-in-chief, business manager, advertising solicitor, collector, and reporter for a country daily.

"My first venture on my own hook was with a paper that had died on a fellow's hands in a town about as big as a circus tent and about as rococo as an Egyptian mummy; and during the two or three years of my struggles there I got enough experience in the trials and tribulations of journalism to make me old before my time.

"I printed the paper from old nails on an army press, and four impressions were required for every sheet. As the paper had about five hundred subscribers the work involved was simply frightful, particularly that part of it, which I did as a sort of relief from the strain of editorial effort which I sustained while not setting type or chasing delinquents."

"What part did you do?"

"Well, I worked the roller. Turning a grindstone is a holiday dream of Sicilian rest by comparison. I had my hands as calloused as the frog of a horse's foot after the blisters wore away. The physical sufferings that I bore were trifling when compared with the agonies of doubt which racked my mind when I let it run upon the future. Upon my shoulders rested not only the heavy responsibility of pleasing all the people who read my paper, but the burden of a large family dependent on my efforts. Starvation was the alternative of success, so you may well believe that I trod the thorny way regardless of my bloody feet and the jeers of the enemies that added difficulties where they could not accomplish disaster.

"Ah! those were hard and cruel—days of grinding toil followed by nights full of dread of the morrow. But they were not wholly dark. Indeed, in looking back upon them I scarcely remember the shadows that lay across them. As a child hoards up only memories of summer days and birds and flowers, forgetting the long winters and the leafless trees, so I treasure only the brighter and happier features of that varied experience.

"Generally speaking, the country editor is a man of some consequence in his community. His position it matters not how precarious it may be from a financial point of view. is such as to command a certain social recognition. He finds himself invited to all the parties and balls and picnics and weddings. He is a mourner at every funeral, a guest at every feast; he is the secretary of every public meeting, the receptacle of the confidences of all who aspire; his advice is sought by the young, and he is the especial protege of all the old. His trousers may be baggy at the knees, but the big man of the village, mindful of the power of the press, stops to talk with him in front of the postoffice and shows him about town in his carriage. The Hon. John Quincy Adams Smithers, M. C., comes down from the city to look after his fences around Podunk, and he makes a bee-line for the editor's sanctum, where he cracks a chestnut and passes around fat-looking cigars that exhale the very odor of luxury. The presiding elder also honors the editor's dingy den with his pious presence, the president of the local railway company sends him a pass—that is, he used to; all the farmers fetch him the biggest ear of corn, the first watermelon, the the prize pumpkin, or the banner sheaf of wheat; and, more than all and better, the village beauties call in the bevies to view the mysteries of the art preservative and flirt with the editor's assistant. That is the treat of all treats, and what wonder if the editor gets to dreaming dreams and weaving fancies with a woof of golden hair?

"No; I didn't fall a victim myself, but I'm an exception. The average county editor marries young. The pressure is all that way and so the editor one day leaves out the well known personal that 'Miss Mary Tibbitts, the bewitching blue-eyed daughter of Col. Ezra Tibbits, illuminated our sanctum with her bright presence for a few minutes yesterday,' and in its place we read the announcement that we were married last night, at the resihsnce of the bride's parents to Miss Mary Tibbitts, daughter of Col. Ezra Tibbitts, in the presence of a brilliant assemblage of relatives and friends,' etc.

"By and by he succeeds in scraping together a little money, and he branches out, very likely going to the county town as a partner in one of the organs. If he has developed the right sort of stuff he succeeds fairly well in his larger field and makes money. Perhaps as years go by he is elected to an office or given the postmastership; he accumulates property, lives in a decent little cottage, surrounded by books and papers and odds and ends of bric-a-brac, dying at last, full of years and honors, regretted by all."

Our Eyes are Close Together

Pittsburg Dispatch.

The effort of the War Department to secure a field glass for the service of greater power than the one they now use has discovered the fact that the eyes of the average American are closer together than those of men in foreign countries. The double glass, known as the field glass, now used is weaker than that used in the armies of Europe. It is of only from five to six powers—entirely too weak for the purpose. The only glass they can get of sufficient power is a single spy glass which is defective in that it does not take in a broad enough field. The best military field glass in use is that with which the German army is supplied. An attempt was made to adopt them by the War Department, but it was found that the eyes of the glasses, were so far apart that they could not be used by Americans. The department is studying now to overcome this difficulty.

Three men were injured by an accident at Lacrosse, two of whom are expected to die, and the third is in a serious condition. A crib of lumber just completed on the ways was launched, but before entering the water the grub pin caught in the ways and the crib struck. A dozen men went down to start it, and most of them getting between the ways and pushing. While thus engaged another crib above them became loosened and slipped down on them. A warning about was given, and all but three got entirely out of the track.

Mr. Dingles and the Plaster

Hartford Times.

Dingles had a lame back, and happening to mention that fact in the village store the other evening, was informed of eleven different sure cures by a eleven different individuals in as many minutes. Among the remedies recommended was one to the effect that a plaster made of white pine pitch and applied to the affected part would work a cure in from one to three days.

This prescription took Dingles's fancy. He believed that nature had a remedy for every disease that flesh is heir to, and if every man would become an experimental herbalist and study the effect of different herbs on different diseases and apply them intelligently there would be no need of doctors and their bills, for every man would then be his own physician, which he had no doubt was the intention of an all-wise Providence.

Dingles is a prominent member of the village church, and prides himself somewhat on his flow of oratory and command of rhetoric.

Next morning Dingles took an old, cracked, China mug and a hatchet and went out into the primeval forest, and hacked a pine tree until it yielded him enough pitch for his purpose. This he spread thinly on a piece of flexible leather, and with the assistance of his wife, placed it where it would do the most good. Then he took his hand rake and went out into the garden to prepare it for the spring ploughing.

The morning was warm, and as he worked his back underneath the plaster began to itch and burn, and Dingles winked knowingly at an imaginary personage, and said:

"That's the way with Dame Nature's remedies. They go right to work. Nothing homeopathic about them. Don't have to wait a week before you know what they are going to do."

And he whistled merrily and said he felt as though he could jump a five barred gate already.

Pretty soon he began to perspire, and the plaster seemed suddenly to develop legs and feet and crawled all over his anatomy, till he felt like one huge court-plaster and his clothes stuck to him so that he could not stoop without choking. Then he leaned his rake against the fence and went into the house, with a cloud on his usually sunny countenance.

"My dear," he said to his wife as mildly as circumstances would allow; "my dear there is something the matter with that ding plaster. It has evidently cured my back, and is now meandering around my manly form in search of other sore spots to heal, and I will have to get you to help me capture it. I think it is now under my right arm."

Mrs. Dingles was dressing the baby, but she put him in his high chair and gave him his father's decorated shaving cup, with "Love the giver" inscribed on it in gilt letters, to play with, and went to the rescue. The cup had been given to Mr. Dingles by an old flame before he was married, and Mrs. D. did not value it highly.

Dingles had repaired to his chamber and prepaired for the ordeal. He viewed his unpleasant position in a jocular light, and said, as he assumed a recumbent attitude, face downward, across the bed, the better to facilitate Mrs. D.'s movements:

"Although I never deemed myself a vain man, yet I certainly am stuck up."

Here Mrs. Dingles, with a careless abandon that showed her entire ignorance of the business in hand, gave the adherent nether garment a sharp twitch, which caused Dinglas to ejaculate "Oh!" with four exclamation points, and brought him to the perpendicular with a jerk.

"What in thunder are you trying to do; flay me alive?" he shouted, with fire in his eye and fight in his voice.

Mrs. Dingles, who is unused to being addressed in that manner, looked frightened for a moment, then burst into tears, and said that he did not love her any more, and she would take her poor, helpless, innocent babe, and go into the cold world and earn an honest living for herself and it, and not be a burden to him any longer.

This was too much for Dingles. Her tears quenched the fire of his anger. He loves his wife and baby tenderly, and told her so, and emphasized it in a way peculiar to married men when making up their little tiffs with their wives. He assured her that he was only fooling, and said:

"Come, Merier, let's proceed with this little experiment in vivisection; but for heaven's sake, go slow."

Mrs. Dingles, who had now acquired a more delicate knowledge of the delicate nature of the task before her, got a case knife, and by gently inserting its thin edge, endeavored to pry the clinging drapery loose, while Dingles writhed and groaned and muttered suspicious language; and Mrs. Dingles said, "Hush! Daniel, remember your standing in the community," and Daniel, from the depths of his anguish, said, "Hang the community!"

Then Mrs. Dingles dropped her improvised scappel and said she wasn't going to stand there and be sworn at, when she was doing the best she could and flounced out of the room, took up the baby, and sitting down in a rocker began to sing—

And must I be to judgment brought,
And answer on that day,
For every vain and idle thought
And every word I say?

Dingles begged her pardon humbly, and said he did not mean it and would take it back. He didn't want the community hanged. Then he implored her, with tears in his eyes not to forsake him in his dire extremity. Something had to be done. He could not go through life halt and maimed in that way, and wanted to know if she could not ravel the the thing out and take it off one thread at a time.

Here Mrs. D. was struck with a brilliant idea. She said she would run over to Mrs. Jones's and ask her what to do, which she accordingly did and so startled that benevolent old lady with her story of Dingles's predicament and that she thought he must be dying, and rushed over forthwith to see what could be done to save him.

Dingles had just time to barricade his door and shout through the keyhole that he was not at home to company, or she in her anxiety would have rushed in on him in his unprepared state. Then Mrs. Jones told Mrs. Dingles to get some grease and a basin of hot soapsuds; then she directed from the outside, while Mrs. D. executed her commands. By greasing his back thoroughly and then applying the soap and water they finally, after an hour's hard work, relieved him of his tenacious adherent, and he emerged clothed, but hardly in his right mind for he said, "If it were not for his position in the community he'd be dinged if he wouldn't thump the man that told him about the plaster till his teeth rattled." Then he bound them both to secrecy and went out and resumed his interrupted occupation.

But, through the united efforts of the three to keep the affair quiet, it was spread all over the place before night, and Dingles heard of it so often, and in such exasperating language, that he got mad and said he was the victim of a conspiracy, and used forcible language and backslid, and his pastor had to labor with him long and faithfully before he could be induced to resume his former prominent position in the church.

Mesmerism made him a Perjurer.

A story of perjury through mesmerism was told in Judge Toohey's courtroom in San Francisco, at the trial of Chas. R. Backman, charged with having fired the ship Brussels, in the harbor March 9. The police arrested Chas. R. Backman, the steward, and Clarence L. Caskey, first mate, of the vessel, for the crime. They made several statements implicating Capt. Crosby, of the ship, and Corcoran, the night watchman. Crosby has since shipped on another vessel, and will not be in port again for several months. Detectives did not place much faith in Backman and Caskey's statements in regard to Crosby, and made several attempts to induce them to confess. They stoutly maintained their innocence, however.

Caskey, on the stand, made a decided sensation when he declared that Capt. Lee and Detective Byram told him that they did not care what he said or whether his statement was true or not as long as he exonerated Capt. Crosby.

"That man there," said he, pointing to Backman, "made me do it. He has me completely in his power. He exercises a mesmeric influence over me, and whenever I am near him I must do as he wills. He wields terrible and hellish power over me. It was Backman who coached and forced me to tell that story about capt. Lee's and Detective Byram yesterday. They never asked us to exonerate Capt. Crosby. Last night I was placed in a separte cell, and as soon as I was out of Backman's presence his influence over me fled and I was myself again. I sent for Assistant District-Attorney Dunne and told him I was ready to tell the truth."

Backman kept his piercing black eyes on the witness all the time, and if he had any mesmeric influence over him it had lost its force. Backman is a dark-skinned, black-haired, undersized man who looks like a Spaniard. He was convicted of arson in the first degree.

Physiology in Romance.

From the London Spectator.

The realm of the half supernatural has been much worked, but it is by no means exhausted yet. Is there nowhere a family merged in our complex civilization which descends, and knows that it descends, from the race believed by old commentators to be mentioned in Genesis, the half-breeds of heaven, the children of angels and men, and which retains from that descent powers and capacities and longings, and above all certainties as to another life, and with them religious obligations unknown to its fellows all around, always operative, yet always of necessity concealed?

Is there no one who is undying, yet must obey all other conditions of humanity; no one, except St. Leon, for whom wealth is producible at will, yet who dreads to use his power; no one possessed of the faculty Bulwer used no hint at, but never utilized in his half supernatural stories, of generating in another mind any idea he would? The novelist who have used mesmerism as a machine have thought of that power, but have always limited it to its subject's periods of unconsciousness and employed it for some comparatively trifling end.

Except in the departments of mesmerism and sleep-walking the romance writers have hardly utilized the facts of physiology now creeping slowly into common knowledge, while they have left the machinery of science to Jules Verne, who uses it with the intellectual subtlety of a peep-show proprietor who has hired an electric light. Suppose a man in his sleep learned all the waking he desired to know. It would be but a grand exaggeration of some well-known mental processes in sleep.

Napoleon's Star.

Among the common hallucinations of the insane is the belief that a certain star influences their destiny. The hallucination has been shared by some of the great men of the earth to such an extent that a French writer devotes a chapter in his work, "Hallucinations," to the stars of great men. The author, Brierre de Boismont, gives the following account of the star of the first Napoleon, which he heard, second-hand, from General Rapp:

In 1806 General Rapp, on his return from the siege of Dentzic, entered Napoleon's study without being announced, and found him so absorbed that his entry was unperceived.

The general, seeing the Emperor continue motionless, made a noise. Napoleon roused himself, and, without any preamble, seizing Rapp by the arm, said to him, pointing to the sky:

"Look there, up there!"

The general remained silent, but on being asked a second time, said he saw nothing.

"What, you do not see it;" exclaimed Napoleon. "It is my star; it is before you; brilliant. It has never abandoned me; I see it on all great occasions, it commands me to go forward, and it is a constant sign of good fortune to me."

Napoleon was an actor, and ready to impose on men, but it is possible that this outburst was due to a real hallucination.

One of the largest and most enthusiastic meetings ever held in Chicago was that of the Irish-Americans. The object of the gathering was to protest against the papal rescript. Resolutions to that end were adopted. Speeches were made by ex-Congressman Finerty, Matthew P. Brady and others.

Cleveland and Thurman.

The democrats have made their ticket and this is it. After carefully looking the ground over, trying to decide which horse they better ride, Low Tariff, or High Tariff, they finally concluded to try to ride 'em both at once and thus you see Cleveland on the low tariff horse, and Thurman on the high tariff horse, but as the horses travel in opposite directions, it is not hard to predict that the outcome will be disastrous to the party. Could they have risen above their party traditions and left out that question of policy, they would have done far better. This action but confirms our opinion that the party is not and never has been sincere in its professions of tariff reform and all in the world they care about is its influence in elevating the democratic party into power. They are afraid to risk it on the reduction idea alone but must needs go fishing for the high tariff vote with the natural result that they are liable to get badly left.

If Knute Nelson keeps on awhile longer the people of Minnesota will take him by force and make a United States Senator of him. A few days since he tried to beat a little sense into the party in the House—urging a substitute bill for the Mills bill and later he gives the commissioner of pensions a well-deserved raking over on account of a letter written from the pension department to a Minnesota soldier who had asked for an examination for an increase. It was a one-armed soldier, who claimed to be unable to support himself and family and the reply he got said that "he had not shown that he could not work with the whole arm, therefore the request was denied!" Mr. Nelson referred to the matter and gave the Hon. Commissioner such a scoring as he will doubtless long remember; anyhow no old soldier will ever forget it and will ever feel that he has a friend in Mr. Nelson who is true blue to the core every time round.

If the democratic party was sincere in its profession of reform there would be a greater effort put forth to accomplish some grand result as an evidence of sincerity at least. But they are not built that way to any alarming extent. By an accident they secured control of the administration four years ago, but in vain we look for the fulfillment of all the promises they have been making for the past twenty years. The people have a right to expect some results by this time, but instead of trying to do something to prove their fitness for being entrusted with the government, no sooner had they assumed control than they began to lay the wires to perpetuate their reign, regardless of the effect that a wise use of their position would have upon the country and their chances of retaining the reins of government. The democratic party has become so used to being a "going to do" party that they cannot get over the habit and hence the air is filled continually with what they "are going to do!" In the name of common sense why don't they do more and talk less.

"Peterson" for July is a capital number in every respect, and, from the first page to the last, cannot fail to delight every woman who sees it. This month begins a new volume with a brilliancy surprising even in this magazine, from which one always expects so much. The steel-plate, "Jack's Mother," is a gem; the mammoth steel fashion-plate is good in design and color; and all the other illustrations are first-class. The opening article, "How a Great English Noble Lives," is of unusual interest at this time, as it gives an account, copiously illustrated, of Hatfield House and its owner, the Prime Minister of England. Mrs. Lucy H. Hooper's story, "Doctor Davenant's Daughter," is one of the most original and absorbing sketches we have read in a long while—and, indeed, the tales and poetry generally are up to the best mark. The new serial, "A Knight of the Garter," by Mrs. Olivia Lovell Wilson, begins in a very fresh bright way; it is a study of watering-place life, just suited to this season. The fashions and needlework-designs alone are invaluable to every lady of taste. Now is the time to subscribe or to form a club. Send for a sample-copy. Terms: Two Dollars a year, with great reductions to clubs. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Herald Improvements.

The Grand Forks Herald has just completed its extensive improvements in building, machinery and facilities. These additions to its working capacity have been made necessary by constantly increasing business, with which the office has hitherto been unable to keep pace. As the building now stands, it is a complete two-story structure, brick veneered throughout and the most conveniently arranged office in the territory. A large apartment has been added to the bindery, making room for an additional force of workmen and for the new line of machinery which has just been purchased. The Herald bindery is now fully equipped with a new and complete outfit of machinery, rendering its capacity second to no establishment in the territory. The high standard of its work will be maintained and fine book binding and the manufacture of blank books will continue to be made a specialty. With its superior and experienced workmen, the Herald is prepared to compete with any house in the Northwest. The press room has also been doubled in size and its equipment improved by the addition of a new Babcock pony press with a printing capacity of $3,000 impressions an hour, cost $1,400. The re-arrangement of all departments above and below makes the Herald building a model of convenience enabling it to do all kinds of work in book binding, fine blank book manufacture and general commercial and pamphlet printing with the greatest possible despatch and in a style of execution strictly first-class. The Herald was never better equipped for work than today and its facilities are unsurpassed by any establishment northwest of St. Paul. The building is to be furbished with steam heating apparatus throughout, which will be put in and be ready for use with the return of cold weather.

The Only One.

The Northwest can boast now of possessing the only daily paper in the country whose representatives travel in a private car especially fitted up for their accommodation. The St. Paul Pioneer Press is, of course, that paper; and its enterprise will doubtless be rewarded by a continuance of its phenomenal increase in circulation and popularity.

THE FLOOD!

The Lower Portions of the City Submerged!

Many of Our Citizens Driven from Their Homes by the Rising Water!

Loss Estimated at $10,000.

The continuous rain of Thursday, Friday and Saturday, although looked upon as remarkably heavy and, perhaps, hurtful to crops, did not prepare our citizens for the destructive work of the river on Sunday and Monday.

The storm, following the river throughout its entire length, and extending ten to twenty miles on each side, caused a supply of water that the channel could not possibly carry. The result was an overflow, where the banks are lowest, for many miles above and below the city.

St. Hilaire, although threatened, escaped without loss. Red Lake Falls was less fortunate, Kretzschmar's dam being carried away, and much other damge done. The large number of logs coming down the river and joining the boom, it was with difficulty the logs were held at Crookston.

Early on Sunday morning, the river began overflowing its banks at this point, compelling those living on the low flats to abandon their homes and seek higher ground.

The rise gradually continued until Monday a. m., when it reached the crisis, registering thirteen feet above low-water mark at the Robert Street bridge, and nineteen and one-half feet just below the dam. At that time, Dobson's park, that part of Jerome's addition nearest the river, large portions of Sletten & Cromb's addition and the flat south of the Broadway bridge were submerged.

The inconvenience caused, was much greater than the actual loss, which is estimated by some of our prominent business men at $10,000. At the time of writing, it is hoped by Mr. Jacobus, that the dam will escape serious results, although the test during the next few hours will be severe.

Our citizens find comfort in the fact that such troubles seldom occur, this being unparalleled, with one or two exceptions, since the city was founded.

FLOOD NOTES.

Several sidewalks have gone down stream.

The water rose at the rate of 2 inches per hour on Sunday.

F. Bivins' barn is in the water several feet, owing to the flood.

Ed. Wile: Yes, I'm wet, but not to amount to anything.

Judge Spendley says property his way is high—and dry.

Sunday and Monday were days long to be remembered by our citizens.

The big saw mill was obliged to suspend operations for a few days.

Houses and barns had to be anchored in the flood district on Sunday.

The basement of the St. Louis Hotel received its share of the flood.

Water to the wagon box on the flat south of the Broadway bridge.

Tuesday the river was going down slowly, and all danger of the logs breaking the boom was over.

Al. Jones says that the hill property is on a boom just now; he says that land has risen higher than the river.

Mike Leguee was roosting high on Sunday morning—water up to window sills on first floor. Mike held the fort.

Harry Ives was heard to remark that he was over to the house and found his father holding the house down in good shape.

John McLean wears a serene smile in spite of the water which has flooded his premises and taken possession of his residence.

It was found necessary to remove Mrs. Burgess from her home on the flat to the hill, a tedious task considering the condition she is in.

Ford & Co., talk of adding the machinery necessary and run their soap factory by water, they think they have plenty of water just now.

The Robert street bridge leading to Jerome's addition was in danger of being carried away Sunday night. A gang of men were employed in making it fast to trees.

Lake came down from Angus, in time to have his stable secured from floating down stream. He says they had heavy rains north, but not to compare with our storm.

They do say that Horrie Jennings knows how to ride a log in high water, unless it (said log) should strike a fence. If you should ask him, and he wont tell, ask Walt Bivins.

In going across the Broadway bridge our reporter noted several rods of sidewalk moved into the street; he also saw that the chickens in that vicinity were roosting above high water mark.

It was rather amusing to see those who thought themselves above high-water mark, and who had been moralizing about settling on the flats, tiptoe out of their fast dampening door yards and seek the hill.

Photographer Francis showed our reporter some views of the flood. He pointed out one place where a boat with its passengers rolled down a miniature waterfall over the grade leading from Jerome's addition to the bridge, Fred Lusian spluttered: "I—I thought I was drowned."

A great many of our citizens took it into their heads to "move" on Sunday last, and the day resembled the 1st of May in New York city. Drays, express wagons and all other vehicles that could be utilized for the purpose were called into requisition to get the goods and chattels of those living in the exposed portions of the city to a place of safety. And well it was that they made the change of base on Sunday, for on Monday morning the water had attained such a height that to have reached their domiciles without the aid of a steamboat, would have been impossible, and to have secured their goods, would have required the services of a submarine diver.

Last Sunday morning two city chaps, in high boots, left for a walk in the country. About 3 p. m. they left on the return trip, and from the strides they were taking your reporter was led to think they were in somewhat of a hurry to reach the city. Just imagine their surprise after going four miles through water less than six feet deep, when they arrived at the sidewalk leading to the Robert street bridge, to see said walk going across the road as majestically as the "Majestic Swan," could have done. It was amusing to see them take the back track and shin up the logs for a half mile to find a dry place to land. Our reporter heard one remark that the river was rather high!

ANGUS.

Wide Awake, for June, begins a new volume. "Eurania's Boys and how they Kept House," by Margaret Sidney, will amuse the mothers as well as the boys. "The Story of Boston Common," by Rev. Edward Everett Hale, tells about the early days of this famous ground—the days of the cow pastures and witches, and of the old-time training bands. But the new serial by Mrs. Crowinshield (wife of Commander Crowinshield, U. S. N.) will probably gain the first attention of the boys. A story of training-ship life, "Plucky Smalls: His Story," the title—it is full of fun and adventure. Elbridge S. Brooks tells us about Polo. F. Anstey has a funny dog story. But we cannot give all the titles and authors represented in this issue. Your newsdealer has it for twenty cents—or send to the publishers, D. Lothrop Company, Boston. The subscription price is $2.40 a year. Do you know that Wide Awake has offered $2,000 in prizes for contributions from those connected in any way with schools? CROOKSTON, MINN., JUNE 14.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

Probabilities of Coffee Culture in the United States.

In an article on Coffee Culture in India in the American Agriculturist for June, Rev. A. Norton, Cent. Provinces, India, says: Coffee is grown without irrigation all over the highlands of South India, at an elevation from 2,500 to 3,500 feet adove sea level. It is in these localities where all the large plantations are found. By setting out the trees in the shade, and irrigating during the hot seasons, they can be grown in gardens anywhere in India, except in those sections where the frosts are too severe for it.

In regions like India and Southern California, where there is a long dry season, it is best to transplant the coffee plants six inches apart in nursery rows two feet apart, where they can be conveniently irrigated twice a week. The nursery ground should be enriched and prepared as thoroughly before setting out the plants as if for a bed of cauliflowers or early cabbage. After one year the trees may be transplanted to their permanent places. The ground cannot be too rich for them, but it must be well drained, either naturally or artificially, hence a side hill is a favorable location. The coffee tree thrives much better in the shade than in the open ground, and in the northern hemisphere the north rather than the south side of the hill should be chosen While the coffee tree in semi-tropical regions, near the frost line, gives a lighter yield than in equatorial locations, yet the semi-tropical gives coffee of a superior aroma and quality. The quality depends to a considerable extent, on the process of curing. In order to get the best quality, the berries when ripe should be picked and spread on racks in the shade; after fifteen days the drying of the pulp may be finished in the sunshine, and then the dry husk pounded off. This is said to be the method employed by the Arabs at Mocha. It pays in small gardens, but on large plantations it is impracticable, on account of the large quantities of berries to be pulped in a short time. It is highly improbable that coffee can be grown in the United States with profit, because the manual labor required in weeding, picking etc. can be obtained so much cheaper in other lands with a more congenial climate for it, and because in these days of cheap and rapid transport a commodity like coffee, not easily damaged can be so readily shipped to all competing markets. Yet, it being a shrub easily raised and soon brought to fruitage, with its bright green leaves, its snowy white blossom and cherry-like berries, it ought to find a place in shady nooks in gardens generally, in Southern California, Florida, and the other extreme Southern States, where it would win its way even as an ornamental tree, and be not altogether profitless.

The various charitable institutions of the State located at Faribault—the School for the Deaf and Dumb, the Blind and the Feeble Minded—will make elaborate displays in the Minneapolis Exposition. The perfection attained by these who possess but a portion of the natural endowments of human-kind is wonderful. The artistic work done in the Imbecile School would do credit to the most experienced workman.

Railroad Managers and Employes.

St. Paul Dispatch.

A very valuable article on railroad administration appears in the current number of the Forum, written by Arthur T. Hadley, entitled "Remedies for Railway Troubles." Prof. Hadley differs from all other prominent American publicists in his presentation of the various phases of the railroad question, especially in the particular that he has shown the ability to regard his subject from a point of view other than that which presents itself to the railroad officials themselves. He entertains strong convictions on this great subject and he has the courage of his convictions, no matter in whose favor they may be.

The present article is addressed to the work of suggesting remedies for the disputes between railroad officers and railroad employes about wages and organization. He dismisses successively the remedies which the employes themselves seek to apply, of taking the administration of the roads into their own control, of compulsory arbitration, and of profit sharing. The first remedy is nothing more nor less than communism, the second wholly impracticable and the third difficult if not impossible of application under existing conditions.

The remedy which suggests itself to the mind of the writer is the one about which least has been written or said and the very simplicity of which excludes it from general consideration. He finds in the disposition of the railroad employer to regard his employes as so many animated machines, standing at his hand simply for use in his attempt to pile up millions of wealth, the fundamental and paramount difficulty. So long as the workman is able to do a day's work, it matters not to the road what happens after. Once the man's wages are paid—and the lower the wages the cheaper the machine—there is no reason for further regard of his personality. He may be here today, somewhere else tomorrow. There are thousands like him, eager to get employment on the same terms, or even on terms more favorable to the road. Except the few men in his immediate vicinity or at the heads of the various departments, the man in charge knows no employes, neither does he seek to know them. Whether they are married or single, moral or immoral in their habits, where they came from, how long in his service—all these are questions which never touch him, no more than do like questions affecting their own employes touch two out of a thousand American employers.

The creation of a feeling among employes of permanance and loyalty in the railroad service; the selection as the heads of departments of men with human hearts in their bodies—"leaders, not of dollars, but of men"—the spread among the men of the conviction that they are something more than mere clods of earth to be used to-day and abused to-morrow, that their services are appreciated and liable to win for them promotion; and the feeling that their employment offers them the facilities for guarding their families against destitution in the case of their sudden taking off—these are some of the prime requirements to the peaceful as well as profitable administration of railroads which Prof. Hadley lays down.

The public will not suffer the continued interference with their right to continuous service which flows from the constant wrangling and turmoil which goes on between railroad managers and railroad employes. They see the only certain remedy in state ownership of the roads if railroad managers are unable to fulfill all the conditions and requirements of complete and unbroken public transportation.

Going West.

The general interest that has been taken in the opening of the Montana Indian Reservations is shown by the large numbers of people who have already gone to Great Falls to investigate the mineral and agricultural resources of that wonderful country. The low excursion rate announced by C. H. Warren, Gen. Pass. Agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, makes the expense of exploring this country merely nominal, and will undoubtedly result in a still larger number following. [4-11]

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Our old customers always recommend their neighbor to us.

STEENERSON & McMANUS.

But very few people are aware of the amount of adulteration there is in the different lines of food products. Sugars, jellies, butter and cheese are all liable to adulteration when brought from eastern markets. When in want of a pure article of cheese, call on Hartshorn, Hurlbut & Co. or B. Clements and ask for Hallock cheese which is warranted absolutely pure and full cream stock. By so doing you secure a good article while you encourage home manufacture.

Elias Steenerson has engaged desk room with Christianson Bros., and is now prepared to write insurance in the old reliable Continental Company. This company will insure against losses by fire lightning and cyclones. Mr. Steenerson is the only agent for this old reliable company in Polk and Norman counties and if any other should attempt to represent this company set him down as an impostor and do not deal. Call at Christianson Bros., and consult with Elias. [5-8]

California Wines and Brandies.

Max Ericsson is constantly receiving California Wines and Brandies, the choicest of liquors of all kinds at wholesale and retail, which he can supply at the shortest notice. Half Fare Excursion.

We take special pleasure in calling attention to the excursions to points in Minnesota & Dakota via the St. Paul Minneapolis and Manitoba R'y, from St. Paul or Minneapolis and points South and East which have been announced, leaving St. Paul May 9 and 23 and June 6 and 20, and points South one day earlier, when tickets are to be sold at the low rate of one fare for the round trip. These tickets will be limited to thirty days from date of issue, good ten days going and five for return with stop over within limits. This will enable friends or intending settlers to visit this country during the early spring and summer, at a very small cost. Further particulars can be obtained by addressing Butter Getting Better.

Western Rural and American Stockman: Ten years ago there was no such general demand for practically gilt edge butter that there is now. And while it is true that very many who make the demand cannot distinguish good butter from bad, unless it is very bad, many are fair judges, and their number is increasing all the time. And a demand always creates a supply. For a long time improvement in butter making was confined to professional butter makers, to factories, enthusiasts, experimenters and fancy dairies. But the spirit of improvement, the spirit of progress, has spread wonderfully, though truth compels us to confess that there are dairies which it has not. But it will reach all for two or three reasons. One reason why it will, is that the manufacturers of improved dairy implements and machinery are enterprising, and they will force their improvements upon the attention of butter makers. In doing this they become instructors for they must explain the whys and wherefores. In the absence of schools in which dairy methods might be taught, there is no better way of giving instruction in the principles of improved dairying than through the agents of our creameries, and other dairy implements; and those who may think that the importunities of those people are a considerable nuisance, may get some satisfaction from the thought that they are getting some knowledge from them. It is true that such instruction may be a co-mingling of truth with error to some extent as it will be colored, in many instances, by the sole desire to sell, but the grains of truth, always valuable, can be sifted from the error in actual practice.

There are many, however, who do not wait for instruction from such a source. They know that the dairy is advancing in methods and importance, and they are anxious to know upon what principles it is doing it. Therefore they become students of dairy literature, observers of dairy experiments, and witnesses of the workings of dairy machinery. At fairs, the dairy department is the place where they spend most of their time, and they make inquiry as to new methods which they see noticed in the press and as to new implements which they see advertised. Thus they become posted and the butter which they make becomes better. Gradually, therefore, our stock of good butter increases, but the consumption keeps pace with the supply, and will continue to do so. Our home consumption is steadily on the increase, because our population is steadily on the increase, and because, too, there is more and more butter annually consumed per capita. It perhaps would be difficult for the native American to increase his individual consumption of butter, for he maintains, as a rule, the maximum from the beginning to the end. But it is a fact that the tendency among our foreign population is toward a larger and larger consumption of everything. They imitate the natives in eating to a large degree, and usually having more money here to indulge their tastes than they had in their native home, they indulge them to the fullest extent. There is promise, therefore, of a constantly growing demand at home for the products of the dairy, and foreign markets are open to us, though they have been greatly injured by the dishonesty and greed of American adulterers.

Sweet and Sour Cream.

Western Rural and American Stockman: Which is best for churning, all things considered, sweet cream or sour? asks a correspondent. Sour, we reply. Creamery butter is made from cream but slightly soured, as compared with that usually used for dairy butter; and to our taste, well made dairy butter is the best butter that was ever made. But it is believed that more butter can be made from sour than from sweet cream. In a report of an address, in an English paper, the speaker is made to say that if they had two dairies of fifty cows each, in one of which they churned from the sweet cream and in the other from sour cream, a strict record would show much larger profit in favor of the sour cream. It was well known that the Danes artificially soured their cream. They were wise because they obtained a better yield. A friend of his, a Dane, now a chemist in Sweden at one of the colleges, had made a series of experiments in proof of this, but they had done the same in Canada. They churned with different creams, No. 1 was sweet and No. 6 was sour, the intermediate samples being more or less sour in proportion. The result was that No. 1 gave five and one-fourth per cent of butter in the buttermilk; No. 3, three and one-half pounds; No. 4, two and one-half pounds; No. 5, one pound; and No. 6, three-fourths pound. Sour cream churned better and it mixed better than partly sweet and partly sour, which entailed great loss. Nevertheless, the Danes were wrong in one particular—they washed their butter in the buttermilk and not in cold water, thus enclosing much casein or curd, and that it was which prevented their butter from preserving a fine flavor.

Republicans in St. Paul are pleased With the Selection of Senator Comstock for Congress in the Fifth—Political Gossip.

Pioneer Press.

The selection by the Fifth district Convention of Hon. S. G. Comstock was discussed by some of the politicians of St. Paul and the very few who gathered at the hotels yesterday. All of the Republicans were pleased over the selection, and declare that Mr. Comstock is an able man and will be a credit to the district in Congress. The Democrats have not the least hope of defeating him, and the only thing they bring against him is that his views on the tariff donot coincide with those of Knute Nelson or the people of the district Mr. Comstock's idea of the tariff, as explained by himself some weeks since, was that he believed the stand taken by the Pioneer Press for a moderate and judicious revision of the tariff suited him exactly. He believes in tariff reform, and will work to that end when in congress. One Republican expressed himself on the subject by saying that the Republicans of the Fifth district, with so many good men in the field, could not have made a mistake.

A Model Convention.

Pioneer Press.

That was a model convention at St. Cloud. It fought over the congressional nominations for two days and through forty-five ballots with unfailing good nature and exceptional fairness, and hailed the final success of the strongest candidate with a sincere and generous unanimity rare, if not unparalleled, in the history of nominating conventions. The Fifth district has set a notable example, not only for the rest of the state, but for the whole Union. Every candidate and delegate in the convention has won honor for himself, his followers and his party. The good temper of the defeated emulates the generosity of the victors. The Fifth district has taught the Republican party everywhere how to win victories. The speeches of the candidates, successful and defeated, should be scattered as campaign documents through every congressional district in Minnesota. The reports of the convention should be read and carefully digested by every Republican politician in the First and Third districts, which were turned over to the Democracy last year by fatal indulgence in the contrary spirit to that which controlled the St. Cloud convention. There have been plenty of indications this year that the spirit that lost these two districts to the Republicans two years ago is not dead, and that the mistakes of the last campaign may easily be repeated. The Fifth district convention is once an admonition and an exhortation to the Republicans of the First and Third; at once a beacon light and a guide post. They will do well to heed its lesson and follow its guidance. That way lies victory. Good temper and fairness in party contests and sincerity and harmony in the acceptance of their results are the most vital elements of party strength. The hope may be cherished, by the way, that the lesson of St. Cloud will not be entirely lost upon the Republican state convention.

The dimly foreshadowed, if not actually expected, is what happened at St. Cloud. Judge Stearns' strength went to pieces, while Mr. Comstock steadily gained through the morning session, the other three substantially holding their own. After adjournment Mr. Buckman's strength went to Comstock, and was followed by two or three of Barto's supporters, giving him fifty votes and the nomination on the forty-fifth ballot. The convention has done wisely. Not only is Mr. Comstock the close personal and political representative and natural successor of Knute Nelson, whose popularity in the Fifth district was never so distinctly apparent as in this convention, but he combines many elements of strength and fitness in his own person; large experience in public life, positive views on public issues, conservative judgment and an untainted reputation. It is no reflection on the other candidates to say that Mr. Comstock is a singularly fit and worthy successor to the Minnesota member who has acquired a wider national reputation and given the state more prominence in Congres than any other who has sat in the house of representatives since his election.

These Are Their Principles.

St. Paul Dispatch: In order that there shall be no doubt whatever as to what is involved in a candidaiy for governor when made in accordance with the demands of the State Farmer's Alliance, we have been at some pains to reproduce here the essential points of all declarations of principles on which, according to the executive committee of that body, such a candidacy must be conducted. We commend them more especially to the careful attention of Mr. Albert Scheffer, who is the accepted champion and exponent of these doctrines.

The platform manifesto adopted recently by the executive committee of the Alliance at which Mr. Scheffer was indorsed, opens by commending to "the careful consideration" of the public, the declaration of rights adopted February 26, 1886, and the address and resolutions adopted February 2, 1888. Of this platform itself and the address which accompanied it we shall speak farther on. For the present we shall lay before our readers the substance of the former declarations which have been included in this platform. Those of the resolutions of Februry 25, 1886, that have any bearing at all on the coming gubernatorial contest, are those which delare that the Republican party is responsible for failing to remedy existing evils while it has been in power, and declaring that there are in Minnesota only two parties, the people and their plunderers—and the only issue: "Shall the people keep the fruits of their own industry, or shall the thieves carry them away?" These resolutions wind up with the following unique production of Farmer Donnelly aimed at his old-time foe, "Jim Hill."

Resolved, That we set forth this declaration of principles, not as suppliants at the feet of power, but as free men demanding their rights. We ask justice not charity. It is adding insult to injury for any man to plunder a community of millions of dollars annually, and then seek to balance the account with a few beggarly pigs and homeless bulls.

The principal resolutions adopted at the meeting of Feb. 2 last, were those which declared the official action of the railroad commisioners to be unsatisfactory, as having done little or nothing toward relieving the agricultural classes of their burdens, and calling upon these officials "to at once issue orders to reduce very largely the rates on transportation on farm productions, and if the railroads refuse to obey the same, to commence proceedings at once to vacate their charters." In addition the following was also adopted:

We demand that the existing rates on railroads in this state be so adjusted that at least $8,000,000 of the money now annually wrung from the people of the state to pay interest on fictitious stock be left in the hands of the producers.

We have already discussed sufficiently for all purposes the latest declaration of principles of this body, adopted at the time its executive committee placed Mr. Schefler in nomination. The address which accompanied that platform is, however, a sufficiently unique affair to merit a somewhat extended quotation. It characterizes better than we can the men and the influences which are behind this movement, and informs conservative people who have large business interests to protect what may come to them in the event of Messieurs, the agricultural politicians being allowed to work their will. The "purer than thou" sentiment which attends all such movements will be found especially noticeble.

Here are some of the sentiments of that address:

"Officers, instead of enforcing the law, become hungry politicians, office-seekers and jobbers, who would barter away their birthright for a mess of pottage. The people of the state are subjects of a cruel, relentless system of robbery that forces them to pay exorbitant prices for all they buy and deprives them of a free market for what they sell. Unjust discriminations against persons and places is practiced with impunity. Laws enacted to protect the people, are a dead letter, or perverted, or made of no effect. Laws are framed and passed in favor of monopoliste. Corruption reigns in high places. All over the country there are hirelings at work to perpetuate this power, cunning knaves talking party prejudice to hide their own sins and lead the people to the polls like sheep to the slaughter."

These declarations are all worthy of careful examination. While every business man throughout the state who reads them will readily distinguish their true drift and significance, it remains to be pointed out that any Republican who gives them his sanction or approval at once condemns his party as unworthy of any share of popular favor. If Republicans in convention assembled a few months hence see fit to adopt them or their advocates as indicative of party policy or party choice it will first be found necessary to disband their party organization and publicly declare that its influence upon the public life of this state and upon the prosperity of the people has been pernicious to the last degree.

An Insult to Old Soldiers.

Duluth Daily Tribune.

Senator Ingalls calls attention to the contempt with which the civil service commission has treated that clause of the law which provides that, everthing else being equal, preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers in making appointments.

Mr. Ingalls shows how the civil service commissioners, appointed and controlled by Mr. Cleveland, have disposed of this statute. They have done so by restricting applications for appointment in the departments to men not over forty years of age. They have arbitrarily, and in the face of this generous statute, adopted a rule shutting out all applicants over forty years of age. As the war closed twenty-three years ago, Senator Ingalls very pithily says that every soldier who was above the age of seventeen years at the close of the war is, by this rule, disqualified for appointment in the civil service.

Step by step the rights and privileges, the honors and rewards of the brave and patriotic men who marched to the music of the union, are being ignored and surrendered, while the highest offices and the most honorable positions both at foreign courts and at home are given to those who distinguished themselves in an attempt to destroy the union of the states.

In the face of this official record, the admirers of Mr. Cleveland have the audacity to quote the words, "public office is a public trust."

This open defiance of law, this high-handed outrage upon justice and patriotism by these cretures of Cleveland, is enough to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of even the "Widdow McGinnis' pig."

Marion Harland's Opinion of Baking Powders.

Our readers have doubtless noticed the numerous discussions by the scientists and hygienists as to the relative value of the various baking powders. A careful sifting of the evidence leaves no doubt as to the superiority of the Royal Baking Powder in purity, wholesomeness and strength, from a scientific standpoint. An opinion, however, that will weigh heavier than any other with our practical house-keepers, is that given by Marian Harland, the best known and most popular of American writers upon matters pertaining to the science of domestic economy, of housekeeping, and home cooking. In a recent letter to the Philadelphia Ladies Home Journal, this writer says:

"I regard the Royal Baking Powder as the best manufactured and in the market, so far as I have any experience in the use of such compounds. Since the introduction of it into my kitchen, three years ago, I have used no other in making biscuits, cakes, etc., and have entirely discarded for such purposes, the home-made combination of one-third soda, two-thirds cream of tartar.

"Every box has been in perfect condition when it came into my hands, and the contents have given complete satisfaction. It is an act of simple justice, and also a pleasure, to recommend it unqualifiedly to American housewives.

Marion Harland.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1887."

For the past two years the Exposition at Minneapolis has had strong musical features. The Mexican Band the first year created a sensation which was followed last by bringing Liberati's great band from New York. This season the management have made a contract with the most celebrated band in the country, that of the 7th Regiment, New York's crack military organization, and the opening day at the Exposition, August 22d, will see Sig. Cappa in his place as conductor, at the head of 50 eminent soloists and instrumentalists. Sig. Cappa has been at the head of the 7th Regiment band ever since he left the Thomas Orchestra ten years ago, and is probably the best known band leader in the world. He has been decorated by almost every European monarch, and medaled by friends and admirers in the East until his massive chest has grown too small to allow of his wearing all the jeweled evidences of his popularity and skill. The King of Italy has made him Chevalier of the first-class of the Royal Order of Merit. It is of this decoration from the King of his native country in the array of which he served his first term of enlistment that he is the most proud.

The Profits of Farming.

Correspondence of Country Gentleman.

In this part of the country, the land is good enough for all farming purposes, it is easily tilled, the climate is healthful, water is plentiful—four conditions exceedingly favorable to the business of farming—yet farmers generally are not making money beyond what is necessary for a very careful close way of living, although there are some who are getting rich. Five farmers will say to you: "There is nothing in farming any more; prices are so low that we can barely make a living at it." The sixth one will say: "Farming is a safe business, and as profitable as any kind of productive industry with which I am acquainted. The prices of some farm products are low, but on the average they are fairly renumerative; And on the other hand, clothing and groceries are low in price, which helps out on the profit side."

This is no fable or allegory—it is actual fact, but no new thing. If wheat were worth $2, corn $1, wool 60 cents, and other products proportionately high, there would still be about as many farmers who would barely fetch things around at the years end, as now—not a dollar laid by, pocket books empty and business credit none of the best. Why is this? It is from lack of business habits, lack of business tact and management, or from trying to run some other business in connection with farming. A farmer in this neighborhood, at the beginning of the war in 1861, owned 600 acres of splendid land, with living water running through it; he owed but little, and had two sons large enough to do farm work. After the war began, there was a brisk demand for beef. He thought he saw money in buying and shipping cattle—a fatal illusion. He sold a part of his farm and went into the cattle trade, leaving the boys and hired man to run the farm. After a year or two, the oldest boy was needed in the cattle busines. To-day, strangers own these broad, fertile acres, and the former owner is homeless. How did that happen, do you ask? Why, he undertook a business that he knew nothing about—an outside speculation—and neglected his farm which he knew how to manage, which required all his time, all his business ability, all his care and watchfulness, all his skill and tact as a producer and financier, all steadiness of purpose of the sturdy mariner who at the wheel takes his ship through the Narrows safely in a storm. Speculation ruined him. The notion that there is some easier way to make money than by digging it out of the soil often gets away with farmers, and when a farmer's mind is filled with any such fancy, no matter what direction it may lead him, his fate is sealed.

I know another young man in this township who married and lived on a beautiful fertile farm—not a foot of waste land upon it. He was industrious and made money, built a fine residence and barns, and as he went along to prosperity was rearing three or four boys. Then the inventive genious of the age began to bring into the world of industry those wonders, the reaper, the mower, the threshers and other horse machinery, and the makers wanted agents. This man was drawn into the current that was sweeping over the country. Of course, the farm thereafter received but small share of his time or attention. He lost his farm and soon after died himself. His widow works by the day or week. Speculation ruined them also.

A man must stick to his regular business. If farmer, he must be a farmer altogether; if a merchant, a merchant altogether. Let speculators make their hundreds or their thousands in a day or year, stick to your regular trade or occupation, never looking to the right or left. You understand that, and it demands of you your best talents, for there is always a chance to do better every year that flies over your head. There is no profession or business that calls for more business tact than farming. With all the varied elements with which the farmer has to do, if he does not give it his undivided attention, how can he succeed? He cannot. "Well, it is so slow and toilsome!" some one will say. So is merchandising, so are mechanical pursuits, the ministry and legal professions. The height to competency, greatness or honor is not reached at a bound, but by slow and toilsome stages. There are no difficulties which diligence and assiduity will not overcome.

To succeed in the business of farming, one must have good business habits—industry, frugality, close application, knowledge of his soil, of the diseases of animals, and of the conditions of the markets of the country. He should have a regular system of crop following crop—keeping his land in good heart. He must spend a good deal of time on his farm, and very little of it in town. Napoleon, when on a campaign, would often spend days without undressing, riding from point to point, dictating dispatches, examining maps, etc. So let the farmer become wholly interested in his farm duties, and he will scarcely find time, or be inclined to engage in the outside cares which a hazardous speculation always incurs. A forty acre farm, well managed, is a better and safer trust than an investment in any of the tempting speculations or easy money-making schemes within the reach of limited cash resources.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

'Round Home.

Les McDonald went to Minneapolis last week.

Geo. McManus went to Angus on Wednesday on business connected with the firm.

Are you going anywhere July 4th? If so do not forget the low rates via the Manitoba line.

G. D. Francis shows some excellent work in photography. His flood scenes are worth looking at.

Everybody is pleased with the nomination—i. e. everybody who desires to see brains come to the front.

It looks as if every one was planning a holiday on the 4th of July. The low rates announced by the St. P., M. & M. Ry. will influence a great deal of travel.

Huggard, Larsen & Co., are snugly ensconsed in their new quarters at the corner of Broadway and Robert and they do say it is the boss stand. Call and see them.

The Grand Central hotel at St. Cloud is the boss place to put at. Mine host Haywood took lots of pains to please the boys and made hosts of friends among the delegates.

W. H. Davy says it was owing to the "agricultural proclivities" of his supporters that brought the nomination to Comstock. Said he felt happy and confident as long as the White cow was Nye.

Coroner Shephard was summoned to East Grand Forks on Wednesday to attend a case of drowning—probably that of Clark, who was drowned on Sunday while attempting to swim the Red Lake River on a bet.

Excursion July t4h. Do not forget the St. P., M. & M. Ry. has made some very low rates. Tickets to be sold July 2d, 3d and 4th, good, returning, until the 5th, inclusive. For further particulars see ticket agent.

Mrs. A. McKinnon and her sister Miss McDonald were intending to start for a visit to the old home in Canada on Tuesday but on Monday Mrs. McKinnon was taken down with measles which interferes with the program somewhat.

T. K. Torgerson, deputy revenue collector, was in the city early this week. Speaking of Mr. Comstock's nomination he said that he had known him for several years and knew him to be an honest, upright and honorable man, one of the hard workers in the legislature. He says Mr. Comstock's election is sure.

Mrs. Burgess, the lady referred to last week as suffering from blood poisoning was obliged to suffer amputation of the arm on Friday last. At last accounts she was doing nicely. On Monday evening conductor Copeland circulated a subscription list and raised $50 in a short time. Mr. B. was living in the submerged district at the time of the flood and had to remove her on a cot to a higher latitude.

The Times is auxious to have Mr. Comstock defeated so that the Red Lake pine may be held out of the market another decade. The Times well knows that the democratic party in the Fifth district has not an eligible man for the position who could do as much to secure that pine as Mr. Comstock will be able to do—and yet the Times pretends to be for the people.

Even the Times man, (a democrat for revenue only,) indulges in slighting remarks against Mr. Comstock, hoping that some may be misled thereby. When the Times man gets to be as much of a man as the Hon. S. G. Comstock is he will be respectable. He soys Mr. C. is the foe to labor and the poor man! Mr. C. came to this country with the shovel brigade that graded the great Northern Pacific railroad and by dint of hard labor has built up a comfortable income, and his whole future depends upon the success of this country. If he was the man the Times depicts he would hardly associate with everybody as commonly as he does. No, the Times is wilfully mistaken. Mr. Comstock is one of the most common, everyday sort of men one can find in this Northwest occupying the exalted position that he does and all One needs to do to be satisfied upon that point is to become acquainted with him. In nominating O. B. Buckman, W. W. Hartley, called him "the only farmer before the convention;" Mr. Comstock is as much of a farmer as Mr. Buckman is, owning and having run a farm most of the time since he has been at Moorhead, but he did not urge this fact as a reason why he should go to Congress. He utterly disdains to use this or any subterfuge to obtain a seat in Congress, choosing, if he goes, to go simply and solely upon his merits as a plain, honest and capable man. The Times calls him a schemer. We defy the Times young man to prove one instance of the kind or to point out any dishonest, dishonorable act that S. G. Comstock ever did. If being born a poor boy, and, by dint of an honorable ambition and hard labor, working his way up to a lucrative practice be dishonorable then is Solomon G. Comstock guilty of the charge of being a schemer. Such schemers are all too few in this country. We could stand a great many more of them to advantage.

J. B. Berthiaume and wife go out to try the benefits of a few days on the lake.

J. E. O'Brien left for Chicago on Saturday evening to see the next president nominated.

Herman Wold was in from the Thirteen Towns this week. Reports everything flourishing out there.

Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Carey, and Mr. and Mrs. O. B. Rockwood started for Chicago on Saturday evening.

Hon. H. Steenerson went to Chicago on Saturday evening to nominate Walter Q. Gresham.

The German Emperor, who has been for a long time at the point of death, passed away on Friday last.

Joe Mathews has assumed the managment of the opera house and we predict that he will be popular.

Celebrate the Fourth of July by visiting your friends. The Manitoba road will sell excursion tickets at very low rates.

Mr. Edward Messelt and Miss Dorothea Mykkelsby, of Winger, were united for life by Judge C. O. Christianson on Monday evening, June 18th.

Fourth of July excursion rates will be put into effect, as usual, this season, and all having the time to take a holiday should avail themselves of the low rates offered by the Manitoba road.

Peter Becker had the misfortune to lose his ice house during the overflow. He had an immense quantity of ice and the loss will be a severe one to him. His residence also suffered from the flood.

Dr. A. Nelson was in from Fertile on Tuesday. Says he has been very busy during the past winter attending to his many patients but for a few days has had a little more leisure. The doctor is well known in eastern Polk and has a large practice.

A republican club was organized at Fertile last Saturday evening. K. Sandvig was elected president and Dr. A. Nelson vice president. A rousing old time was had, and the boys are determined to push things forward to victory.

M. W. Jenson was up from Garden on Tuesday. Says that ghastly hole in the road near the Rober Street bridge is an unmitigated nuisance which should be remedied at once. He reports that they have not had as much rain as we have and crops are looking splendidly.

We are told by a party in from the town of Knute that Uncle Daniel Cameron, who went to Tacoma a short time ago has returned, satisfied to remain. He says there are about six men to every one job and that a man to go there and succeed needs to stay away. We notice that most who go there are soon glad enough Ta-com-a-way.

Save your money, take a holiday and visit your friends on the 4th of July. The Manitoba road makes a rate of one and one-third fares for round trips in Minnesota, or for interstate trips between Minnesota and Dakota, and one fare for round trip locally in Dakota and Montana. No tickets being sold at these rates, however, for a greater distance than three hundred miles. Tickets will be sold July 2d, 3d and 4th, good returning till 5th, inclusive.

Sheriff Paulsrud informs THE JOURNAL of the death by drowning of two brothers named John and Ove Samuelson which sad event occured on Sunday, near the sheriff's farm in Hubbard. They were in bathing and circumstances indicate that one got beyond his depth and his brother, in attempting to rescue him perished in the attempt. The body of John was recovered about 3 p. m., Sunday and that of Ove at 12 m., on Monday. Both were young and unmarried.

D, Jacobus comes up smiling after the flood and says "it was not such an awful shower after all, and I am glad it was not for it kept me reasonably busy as it was. I put in a good fifty dollars more expense than I need to have done had I known how high the water would come." The water came up into the ash pit and within five inches of the fire box. The dam was not injured although it required sharp work to protect the ends. A levee was thrown up to protect Chase's Addition. Jake deserves great credit for his efforts to keep the protection intact during the flood and there was no time that he could not have turned on the full force of the river at any time if necessary.

That the democrats are aware that the republicans have put up one of our strongest and best men for Congress is evident from their frantic efforts to prejudice the farmers against Mr. Comstock by calling him "a railroad attorney," hoping thus to deceive men and cause them to vote against him. Whether they know or whether they do not know the fact that Mr. Comstock is not nor has he been for three or four years attorney for the Manitoba road, seems to matter little to the average democrat if he can make somebody believe it. But supposing for the sake of argument that he was an attorney for the road? Was not Mr. Nelson before him an attorney for the same road and has he not proved a most faithful public servant for all that? That he has ever been proves one thing that he is an excellent lawyer for the company will employ no other. Railroad companies never employ a stick as legal adviser and a lawyer must be of the very best timber to find employment with them. But the fact of the matter is the democrats know that Mr. Comstock is an able, honest man, a man who is liable to win the race hence anything they can say to deceive men they are very ready to say and the fact that it is a lie don't distress them in the least. But let them worry; the more they abuse him the more will his record appear and that is all that is necessary to convince any honest man of the honesty of his character.

Don't Forget

The Ever Glorious Fourth.

The work of raising funds for the Fourth expenses goes bravely on. On Monday afternoon $165 were subscribed in a very short time by one of the canvassers and no urging had to be done. Everybody seemed anxious to drop an X or a V into the hat, and at this rate a big old-fashioned time is fully assured. The Ada band has been secured, which assures good music. Everybody should contribute his mite to make the affair a grand success.

We Rejoice

In Mr. Comstock's nomination because he is a good man; because he is a strong man; because he is a safe man to tie to; because he will poll more than the full party strength, having many friends in the Prohibition and Democratic parties; because he is an honest, upright, earnest man, and a great worker, and last, but not least, because he feels that he owes a debt of gratitude to Polk County that will prompt his best efforts in our behalf when he is in Congress.

The Creamery.

Mr. E. M. Walsh has purchased the creamery building and fixtures and, with the help of an experienced butter maker, will commence operations this week. Now let the farmers take hold with him and the result will be an institution that will be a credit to our county and a great benefit to the farmers. Mr. Walsh is now in the field drumming up trade. We trust that all will appreciate the importance of this institution and help it all they can.

Newspaper Enterprise.

For enterprise in furnishing the news, and all of the news, the Minneapolis Evening Journal not only takes the cake, but the entire bakery. Mr. Comstock was nominated at St. Cloud on Wednesday, June 13th, at a few minutes past 3 o'clock; the speeches that followed lasted until 4, when the convention adjourned. After the writer had taken supper at the Grand Central, (about 7 p. m.) and was looking about for something to while away the tedium of waiting for the train, a newsboy came along with the Minneapolis Evening Journal, so we caught on and what was our surprise to find, not only the balloting complete, but a pithy summary of all of the speeches, together with a write-up of the successful man. The Journal had a better write-up of the affair than the St. Cloud Daily Times and was only a few minutes later than that paper. Think of that! A newspaper 70 miles from St. Cloud scooping the home sheet! Well, that Evening Journal always was a hustler, but it beat its own record that time.

The St. P., M. & M. Ry. comes to the front with their usual announcement of excursion rates for Fourth of July. See your agent for rates for your family.

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen, a noted temperance speaker, will lecture in the Baptist Church, Monday eve., June 25. Admittance free, collection taken. Go and hear her.

The Clair Patee Comedy Company commence a week's engagement at the opera house on Monday evening, June 25th. This company is highly spoken of by many who have heard them and will doubtless please our theatre-going people.

The McIntyre & Heath Minstrel Co., that was to have appeared on Tuesday evening gave our place the go-by for some unexplained reason leaving manager Mathews out $10 or $15. Joe would like to get his eagle eye on the managment.

The attack on Gilman after the St. Cloud convention is entirely in the interest of the gubernatorial aspirants now in the field, but it will prove a boomerang that will hurt the authors if they don't look out. If they want to elect Charlie Gilman, they can't employ a better means.

John McLean welcomed the return of his father from Georgia on Monday. Mr. McLean has been in the real estate business down there, made considerable wealth but does not like the country just a little bit as a place to live; says they are all democrats down there but that he attempted to leaven the lump with a bit of republican leaven. He looks very much improved in health and is glad to get back to civilization once more. Says he has some property down there and thinks he will send John down to look after it by and by.

The Red Lake Falls Gazette pertinently asks how Mr. Comstock stands on the Red Lake pine question. We can assure the Gazette that Mr. Comstock stands pledged to use his utmost endeavor to throw that pine on the market at the earliest moment possible. Early in the canvass, but before much stir had been made, but after the Moorhead News had presented his name, we wrote asking him if he could help us if he should go to Congress. He replied that he considered that subject of vital interest, not only to us, but also to the balance of the Valley, and should he be selected, he would take great pleasure in doing all in his power to throw that pine upon the market. He said that he should feel highly honored should he be nominated but that he should leave that matter mostly in the hands of his friends feeling that to be so nominated would be far more satisfactory than to go in and make a scramble for it. Since the nomination Mr. Comstock has said: "I feel that I owe my nomination more to the action of Polk County than to any other one influence and the very best I can do for her will not be too much. Her interests shall be sacred in my eyes I assure you!" Mr. Comstock is a man fitted by a long legislative experience to accomplish much for his constituents, and an extensive acquaintance with the members of Congress makes him all the more fitted for the work. He is the choice of the Hon. Knute Nelson and a most worthy successor to a worthy man. Mr. Nelson has gained the reputation of being one of the hardest workers in Congress and our people will find that Mr. Comstock is not one whit behind him in this particular as well as in ability.

Queena.

Grand Forks Plaindealer: "One of the most fascina ting and vivid, yet withal pathetic, portrayals of every day life dramatized, was presented last evening at the opera house by the Clair Patee Co. to a fair sized audience, in a style sublimely grand. To criticise adversely last night's rendition of Queena is distant from our province. We could not, however fain might be our desire, as it was splendid—simply splendid—not a stick in the company. The emotional acting of Miss Edith Arnold and the droll quaint situations and vivacious humor of Willard Simms certainly merited the enthusiastic applause rendered them. O. E. Hallam made an excellent "Lord Walter Huntington" and Miss Mai Maysil as "Florence Nightingale Fletcher" elicited an outburst of merriment on her each "Yes, my lord."

Jim, the Penman," is the play for to-night.

Manager Drew deserves thanks for at last, favoring the citizens of Grand Forks with a first-class dramatic company. The house is thoroughly ventilated—any quantity of ice being brought into requisition—and a packed house is the inevitable to-night. Sinn Bro.'s orchestra is a valuable adjunct to the troupe." Will be in Crookston all of next week.

During the flood the balance of the roof went down the river to the Dakota side and we learn that the happy family are reunited in Fargo. Requiescat in paee.

Mr. Sylvester of the firm of Alderman & Sylvester, with his man Gilbert, and a team of bronchos, created quite a sensation on Main St. Saturday. He had just driven past Herb's when the team broke into a run, and finding it impossible to hold them down alone, he gave Gilbert a line. When about opposite the C. O. D., Gilbert's line broke, whereupon Sylvester pulled the team out of its course, causing the off horse to strike his head against the electric light post on the corner. The horse was knocked senseless, and after two or three hours work over him, it became evident he could not live, and the firm ordered him killed. Both men escaped injury.

Mr. Comstock.

Minneapolis Tribune.

The contest in the Fifth district was warm, but resulted in a most judicious selection. It has long been predicted that Mr. Comstock would sooner or later represent his district in Congress, and unless some unforeseen accident intervenes, the prediction will be fulfilled by his taking possession of the seat now occupied by Hon. Knute Nelson at the opening of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. Comstock is a lawyer by profession, a graduate of Ann Arbor University, and one of the most intelligent and experienced legislators in the state. He is forty-six years of age and has been a citizen of Minnesota since 1870. He was for a short time a resident of this city, and is well known to the older class of public men in this vicinity. He took up his residence at Moorhead some fourteen or fifteen years ago, and at once became a leading citizen of the Red River Valley and of Northern Minnesota. For more than ten years past almost continuously he has been a member of either the house or senate of the state legislature, and both by native talent and experience is one of the best legislators in the state. Ever since the memorable fight between Mr. Kindred and Mr. Nelson, Mr. Comstock has been a pronounced and uncompromising supporter of Mr. Nelson; hence the toga of the latter will hang gracefully from the shoulders of Mr. Comstock, and the Fifth will have a worthy successor to the "little giant."

As to his election there can be no doubt, as the district at each election rolls up a republican majority anywhere from 4,000 to 10,000, and it is hardly probable that there will be found a democrat ready to take the field against Mr. Comstock. Politically, the new candidate is all that could be desired, having been a life-long republican, and in thorough sympathy with all its progressive ideas. Personally, he is a gentleman of wide information, a good lawyer, a thorough business man, and one of the most popular public men of the state. A few month's residence in Washington will convince the people of his district that they have made no mistake in choosing S. G Comstock to succeed even so good a man as Knute Nelson.

The convention seems to have been good natured throughout, the candidates were all gentlemen of ability, and entered into the contest as friends and neighbors, and not as the leaders of discordant factions. It is sincerely to to be hoped that some of the older districts in Minnesota will profit by the example set by the republicans of the Fifth, at the St. Cloud convention, and carry into their counsels the unselfish desire to make nominations solely for the good of the party.

The republicans of the Fifth district have opened the campaign auspiciously and wisely. Let the other districts act with equal circumspection, and Minnesota will again present an unbroken republican front to the Solid South in Washington.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

'Round Home.

Les McDonald went to Minneapolis last week.

Geo. McManus went to Angus on Wednesday on business connected with the firm.

Are you going anywhere July 4th? If so do not forget the low rates via the Manitoba line.

G. D. Francis shows some excellent work in photography. His flood scenes are worth looking at.

Everybody is pleased with the nomination—i. e. everybody who desires to see brains come to the front.

It looks as if every one was planning a holiday on the 4th of July. The low rates announced by the St. P., M. & M. Ry. will influence a great deal of travel.

Huggard, Larsen & Co., are snugly ensconsed in their new quarters at the corner of Broadway and Robert and they do say it is the boss stand. Call and see them.

The Grand Central hotel at St. Cloud is the boss place to put at. Mine host Haywood took lots of pains to please the boys and made hosts of friends among the delegates.

W. H. Davy says it was owing to the "agricultural proclivities" of his supporters that brought the nomination to Comstock. Said he felt happy and confident as long as the White cow was Nye.

Coroner Shephard was summoned to East Grand Forks on Wednesday to attend a case of drowning—probably that of Clark, who was drowned on Sunday while attempting to swim the Red Lake River on a bet.

Excursion July 4th. Do not forget the St. P., M. & M. Ry. has made some very low rates. Tickets to be sold July 2d, 3d and 4th, good, returning until the 5th, inclusive. For further particulars see ticket agent.

Mrs. A. McKinnon and her sister Miss McDonald were intending to start for a visit to the old home in Canada on Tuesday but on Monday Mrs. McKinnon was taken down with measles which interferes with the program somewhat.

T. K. Torgerson, deputy revenue collector, was in the city early this week. Speaking of Mr. Comstock's nomination he said that he had known him for several years and knew him to be an honest, upright and honorable man, one of the hard workers in the legislature. He says Mr. Comstock's election is sure.

Mrs. Burgess, the lady referred to last week as suffering from blood poisoning was obliged to suffer amputation of the arm on Friday last. At last accounts she was doing nicely. On Monday evening conductor Copeland circulated a subscription list and raised $50 in a short time. Mr. B. was living in the submerged district at the time of the flood and had to remove her on a cot to a higher latitude.

The Times is anxious to have Mr. Comstock defeated so that the Red Lake pine may be held out of the market another decade. The Times well knows that the democratic party in the Fifth district has not an eligible man for the position who could do as much to secure that pine as Mr. Comstock will be able to do—and yet the Times pretends to be for the people.

Even the Times man, (a democrat for revenue only,) indulges in slighting remarks against Mr. Comstock, hoping that some may be misled thereby. When the Times man gets to be as much of a man as the Hon. S. G. Comstock is he will be respectable. He soys Mr. C. is the foe to labor and the poor man! Mr. C. came to this country with the shovel brigade that graded the great Northern Pacific railroad and by dint of hard labor has built up a comfortable income, and his whole future depends upon the success of this country. If he was the man the Times depicts he would hardly associate with everybody as commonly as he does. No, the Times is wilfully mistaken. Mr. Comstock is one of the most common, everyday sort of men one can find in this Northwest occupying the exalted position that he does and all One needs to do to be satisfied upon that point is to become acquainted with him. In nominating C. B. Buckman, W. W. Hartley, called him "the only farmer before the convention;" Mr. Comstock is as much of a farmer as Mr. Buckman is, owning and having run a farm most of the time since he has been at Moorhead, but he did not urge this fact as a reason why he should go to Congress. He utterly disdains to use this or any subterfuge to obtain a seat in Congress, choosing, if he goes, to go simply and solely upon his merits as a plain, honest and capable man. The Times calls him a schemer. We defy the Times young man to prove one instance of the kind or to point out any dishonest, dishonorable act that S. G. Comstock ever did. If being born a poor boy, and, by dint of an honorable ambition and hard labor, working his way up to a lucrative practice be dishonorable then is Solomon G. Comstock guilty of the charge of being a schemer. Such schemers are all too few in this country. We could stand a great many more of them to advantage.

J. B. Berthiaume and wife go out to try the benefits of a few days on the lake.

J. E. O'Brien left for Chicago on Saturday evening to see the next president nominated.

Herman Wold was in from the Thirteen Towns this week. Reports everything flourishing out there.

Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Carey, and Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Rockwood started for Chicago on Saturday evening.

Hon. H. Steenerson went to Chicago on Saturday evening to nominate Walter Q. Gresham.

The German Emperor, who has been for a long time at the point of death, passed away on Friday last.

Joe Mathews has assumed the managment of the opera house and we predict that he will be popular.

Celebrate the Fourth of July by visiting your friends. The Manitoba road will sell excursion tickets at very low rates.

Mr. Edward Messelt and Miss Dorothea Mykkelsby, of Winger, were united for life by Judge C. O. Christianson on Monday evening, June 18th.

Fourth of July excursion rates will be put into effect, as usual, this season, and all having the time to take a holiday should avail themselves of the low rates offered by the Manitoba road.

Peter Becker had the misfortune to lose his ice house during the overflow. He had an immense quantity of ice and the loss will be a severe one to him. His residence also suffered from the flood.

Dr. A. Nelson was in from Fertile on Tuesday. Says he has been very busy during the past winter attending to his many patients but for a few days has had a little more leisure. The doctor is well known in eastern Polk and has a large practice.

A republican club was organized at Fertile last Saturday evening. K. Sandvig was elected president and Dr. A. Nelson vice president. A rousing old time was had, and the boys are determined to push things forward to victory.

M. W. Jenson was up from Garden on Tuesday. Says that ghastly hole in the road near the Rober Street bridge is an unmitigated nuisance which should be remedied at once. He reports that they have not had as much rain as we have and crops are looking splendidly.

We are told by a party in from the town of Knute that Uncle Daniel Cameron, who went to Tacoma a short time ago has returned, satisfied to remain. He says there are about six men to every one job and that a man to go there and succeed needs to stay away. We notice that most who go there are soon glad enough Ta-com-a-way.

Save your money, take a holiday and visit your friends on the 4th of July. The Manitoba road makes a rate of one and one-third fares for round trips in Minnesota, or for interstate trips between Minnesota and Dakota, and one fare for round trip locally in Dakota and Montana. No tickets being sold at these rates, however, for a greater distance than three hundred miles. Tickets will be sold July 2d, 3d and 4th, good returning till 5th, inclusive.

Sheriff Paulsrud informs THE JOURNAL of the death by drowning of two brothers named John and Ove Samuelson which sad event occured on Sunday, near the sheriff's farm in Hubbard. They were in bathing and circumstances indicate that one got beyond his depth and his brother, in attempting to rescue him perished in the attempt. The body of John was recovered about 3 p. m., Sunday and that of Ove at 12 m., on Monday. Both were young and unmarried.

D. Jacobus comes up smiling after the flood and says "it was not such an awful shower after all, and I am glad it was not for it kept me reasonably busy as it was. I put in a good fifty dollars more expense than I need to have done had I known how high the water would come." The water came up into the ash pit and within five inches of the fire box. The dam was not injured although it required sharp work to protect the ends. A levee was thrown up to protect Chase's Addition. Jake deserves great credit for his efforts to keep the protection intact during the flood and there was no time that he could not have turned on the full force of the river at any time if necessary.

That the democrats are aware that the republicans have put up one of our strongest and best men for Congress is evident from their frantic efforts to prejudice the farmers against Mr. Comstock by calling him "a railroad attorney," hoping thus to deceive men and cause them to vote against him. Whether they know or whether they do not know the fact that Mr. Comstock is not nor has he been for three or four years attorney for the Manitoba road, seems to matter little to the average democrat if he can make somebody believe it. But supposing for the sake of argument that he was an attorney for the road? Was not Mr. Nelson before him an attorney for the same road and has he not proved a most faithful public servant for all that? That he has ever been proves one thing that he is an excellent lawyer for the company will employ no other. Railroad companies never employ a stick as legal adviser and a lawyer must be of the very best timber to find employment with them. But the fact of the matter is the democrats know, that Mr. Comstock is an able, honest man, a man who is liable to win the race hence anything they can say to deceive men they are very ready to say and the fact that it is a lie don't distress them in the least. But let them worry; the more they abuse him the more will his record appear and that is all that is necessary to convince any honest man of the honesty of his character.

Don't Forget

The Ever Glorious Fourth.

The work of raising funds for the Fourth expenses goes bravely on. On Monday afternoon $165 were subscribed in a very short time by one of the canvassers and no urging had to be done. Everybody seemed anxious to drop an X or a V into the hat, and at this rate a big old-fashioned time is fully assured. The Ada band has been secured, which assures good music. Everybody should contribute his mite to make the affair a grand success.

We Rejoice

In Mr. Comstock's nomination because he is a good man; because he is a strong man; because he is a safe man to tie to; because he will poll more than the full party strength, having many friends in the Prohibition and Democratic parties; because he is an honest, upright, earnest man, and a great worker, and last, but not least, because he feels that he owes a debt of gratitude to Polk County that will prompt his best efforts in our behalf when he is in Congress.

The Creamery.

Mr. E. M. Walsh has purchased the creamery building and fixtures and, with the help of an experienced butter maker, will commence operations this week. Now let the farmers take hold with him and the result will be an institution that will be a credit to our county and a great benefit to the farmers. Mr. Walsh is now in the field drumming up trade. We trust that all will appreciate the importance of this institution and help it all they can.

Newspaper Enterprise.

For enterprise in furnishing the news, and all of the news, the Minneapolis Evening Journal not only takes the cake, but the entire bakery. Mr. Comstock was nominated at St. Cloud on Wednesday, June 13th, at a few minutes past 3 o'clock; the speeches that followed lasted until 4, when the convention adjourned. After the writer had taken supper at the Grand Central, (about 7 p. m.) and was looking about for something to while away the tedium of waiting for the train, a newsboy came along with the Minneapolis Evening Journal, so we caught on and what was our surprise to find, not only the balloting complete, but a pithy summary of all of the speeches, together with a write-up of the successful man. The Journal had a better write-up of the affair than the St. Cloud Daily Times and was only a few minutes later than that paper. Think of that! A newspaper 70 miles from St. Cloud scooping the home sheet! Well, that Evening Journal always was a hustler, but it beat its own record that time.

The St. P., M. & M. Ry. comes to the front with their usual announcement of excursion rates for Fourth of July. See your agent for rates for your family.

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen, a noted temperance speaker, will lecture in the Baptist Church, Monday eve., June 25. Admittance free, collection taken. Go and hear her.

The Clair Patee Comedy Company commence a week's engagement at the opera house on Monday evening, June 25th. This company is highly spoken of by many who have heard them and will doubtless please our theatre-going people.

The McIntyre & Heath Minstrel Co., that was to have appeared on Tuesday evening gave our place the go-by for some unexplained reason leaving manager Mathews out $10 or $15. Joe would like to get his eagle eye on the managment.

The attack on Gilman after the St. Cloud convention is entirely in the interest of the gubernatorial aspirants now in the field, but it will prove a boomerang that will hurt the authors if they don't look out. If they want to elect Charlie Gilman, they can't employ a better means.

John McLean welcomed the return of his father from Georgia on Monday. Mr. McLean has been in the real estate business down there, made considerable wealth but does not like the country just a little bit as a place to live; says they are all democrats down there but that he attempted to leaven the lump with a bit of republican leaven. He looks very much improved in health and is glad to get back to civilization once more. Says he has some property down there and thinks he will send John down to look after it by and by.

The Red Lake Falls Gazette pertinently asks how Mr. Comstock stands on the Red Lake pine question. We can assure the Gazette that Mr. Comstock stands pledged to use his utmost endeavor to throw that pine on the market at the earliest moment possible. Early in the canvass, but before much stir had been made, but after the Moorhead News had presented his name, we wrote asking him if he could help us if he should go to Congress. He replied that he considered that subject of vital interest, not only to us, but also to the balance of the Valley, and should he be selected, he would take great pleasure in doing all in his power to throw that pine upon the market. He said that he should feel highly honored should he be nominated but that he should leave that matter mostly in the hands of his friends feeling that to be so nominated would be far more satisfactory than to go in and make a scramble for it. Since the nomination Mr. Comstock has said: "I feel that I owe my nomination more to the action of Polk County than to any other one influence and the very best I can do for her will not be too much. Her interests shall be sacred in my eyes I assure you!" Mr. Comstock is a man fitted by a long legislative experience to accomplish much for his constituents, and an extensive acquaintance with the members of Congress makes him all the more fitted for the work. He is the choice of the Hon. Knute Nelson and a most worthy successor to a worthy man. Mr. Nelson has gained the reputation of being one of the hardest workers in Congress and our people will find that Mr. Comstock is not one whit behind him in this particular as well as in ability.

Queena.

Grand Forks Plaindealer: "One of the most fascinating and vivid, yet withal pathetic, portrayals of every day life dramatized, was presented last evening at the opera house by the Clair Patee Co. to a fair sized audience, in a style sublimely grand. To criticise adversely last night's rendition of Queena is distant from our province. We could not, however fain might be our desire, as it was splendid—simply splendid—not a stick in the company. The emotional acting of Miss Edith Arnold and the droll quaint situations and vivacious humor of Willard Simms certainly merited the enthusiastic applause rendered them. O. E. Hallam made an excellent "Lord Walter Huntington" and Miss Mai Maysil as "Florence Nightingale Fletcher" elicited an outburst of merriment on her each "Yes, my lord."

Jim, the Penman," is the play for to-night.

Manager Drew deserves thanks for at last, favoring the citizens of Grand Forks with a first-class dramatic company. The house is thoroughly ventilated—any quantity of ice being brought into requisition—and a packed house is the inevitable to-night. Sinn Bro.'s orchestra is a valuable adjunct to the troupe." Will be in Crookston all of next week.

Mr. Sylvester of the firm of Alderman & Sylvester, with his man Gilbert, and a team of bronchos, created quite a sensation on Main St. Saturday. He had just driven past Herb's when the team broke into a run, and finding it impossible to hold them down alone, he gave Gilbert a line. When about opposite the C. O. D., Gilbert's line broke, whereupon Sylvester pulled the team out of its course, causing the off horse to strike his head against the electric light post on the corner. The horse was knocked senseless, and after two or three hours work over him, it became evident he could not live, and the firm ordered him killed. Both men escaped injury.

Mr. Comstock.

Minneapolis Tribune.

The contest in the Fifth district was warm; but resulted in a most judicious selection. It has long been predicted that Mr. Comstock would sooner or later represent his district in Congress, and unless some unforeseen accident intervenes, the prediction will be fulfilled by his taking possession of the seat now occupied by Hon. Knute Nelson at the opening of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. Comstock is a lawyer by profession, a graduate of Ann Arbor University, and one of the most intelligent and experienced legislators in the state. He is forty-six years of age and has been a citizen of Minnesota since 1870. He was for a short time a resident of this city, and is well known to the older class of public men in this vicinity. He took up his residence at Moorhead some fourteen or fifteen years ago, and at once became a leading citizen of the Red River Valley and of Northern Minnesota. For more than ten years past almost continuously he has been a member of either the house or senate of the state legislature, and both by native talent and experience is one of the best legislators in the state. Ever since the memorable fight between Mr. Kindred and Mr. Nelson, Mr. Comstock has been a pronounced and uncompromising supporter of Mr. Nelson; hence the toga of the latter will hang gracefully from the shoulders of Mr. Comstock, and the Fifth will have a worthy successor to the "little giant."

As to his election there can be no doubt, as the district at each election rolls up a republican majority anywhere from 4,000 to 10,000, and it is hardly probable that there will be found a democrat ready to take the field against Mr. Comstock. Politically, the new candidate is all that could be desired, having been a life-long republican, and in thorough sympathy with all its progressive ideas. Personally, he is a gentleman of wide information, a good lawyer, a thorough business man, and one of the most popular public men of the state. A few month's residence in Washington will convince the people of his district that they have made no mistake in choosing S. G Comstock to succeed even so good a man as Knute Nelson.

The convention seems to have been good natured throughout, the candidates were all gentlemen of ability, and entered into the contest as friends and neighbors, and not as the leaders of discordant factions. It is sincerely to be hoped that some of the older districts in Minnesota will profit by the example set by the republicans of the Fifth, at the St. Cloud convention, and carry into their counsels the unselfish desire to make nominations solely for the good of the party.

The republicans of the Fifth district have opened the campaign auspiciously and wisely. Let the other districts act with equal circumspection, and Minnesota will again present an unbroken republican front to the Solid South in Washington.

INTENTIONAL DUPLICATE EXPOSURE

TALMAGE'S SERMON.

The Brooklyn Divine Shows Wherein Practical Religion Is Productive of Longevity.

Many People Do Not Live Out One-Half Their Days Because of Their Dissipations and Indulgencies.

Dr. Talmage announced as the subject of his sermon: "Does Religion Prolong Life?" and preached from the text found in Psalm xci, 16:

With long life will I satisfy him.

Following is the discourse in full:

Through the mistake of its friends religion has been chiefly associated with sick beds and grave yards. The whole subject to many people is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid. There are people who cannot pronounce the word religion without hearing in it the clipping chisel of the tomb-stone-cutter. It is high time that this thing were changed, and that religion instead of being represented as a hearse to carry out the dead should be represented as a chariot in which the living are to triumph.

Religion, so far from subtracting from one's vitality, is a glorious addition. It is sanative, curative, hygenic. It is good for the eyes, good for the ears, good for the spleen, good for the digestion, good for the nerves, good for the muscles. When David in another part of the Psalms, prays that religion may be dominant, he does not speak of it as a mild sickness, or an emaciation, or an attack of moral and spiritual cramp; he speaks of it as "the saving health of all nations;" while God, in the text, promises longevity to the pious, saying: "With long life will I satisfy him."

The fact is that men and women die too soon. It is high time that religion joined the hand of medical science in attempting to improve human longevity. Adam lived 930 years. Methuselah lived 969 years. As late in the history of the world as Vespasian, there were at one time in his empire forty-five people 135 years old. So far down as the sixteenth century Peter Zartan died at 185 years of age. I don't say that religion will ever take the race back to antediluvian longevity, but I do say the length of human life will be greatly improved.

It is said in Isiah: "The child shall die a hundred years old." Now, if according to scripture the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred and four hundred and five hundred? The fact is that we are mere dwarfs and skeletons compared with some of the generations that are to come. Take the African race. They have been under bondage for centuries. Give them a chance and they develop a Frederick Douglass or a Toussaint L'Ouverture. And if the white race shall be brought from under the serfdom of sin what shall be the body? What shall be the soul? Religion has only just touched our world. Give it full power for a few centuries and who can tell what will be the strength of man and the beauty of woman and the longevity of all?

My design is to show that practical religion is the friend of long life. I prove it, first, from the fact that it makes the care of our health a positive Christian duty. Whether we shall keep early or late hours, whether we shall take food digestible or indigestible, whether there shall be thorough or incomplete mastication, are questions very often deferred to the realm of whimsicality; but the Christian man lifts this whole problem of health into the accountable and the divine. He says: "God has given me this body, and he has called it the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to deface its altars or mar its walls or crumble its pillars is a God-defying sacrilege."

He sees God's caligraphy in every page—anatomical and physiological. He says: "God has given me a wonderful body for noble purposes."

That arm with thirty-two curious bones, wielded by forty-six curious muscles, and all under the brain's telegraphy; 350 pounds of blood rushing through the heart every hour, the heart in twenty-four hours beating 100,000 times, during the twenty-four hours overcoming resistances amounting to 224,000,000 pounds of weight, during the same time the lungs taking in fifty-seven hogsheads of air, and all this mechanism not more mighty than delicate and easily disturbed and demolished.

The Christian man says to himself: "If I hurt my nerves, if I hurt my brain, if I hurt any of my physical facilties I insult God and call for dire retribution." Why did God tell the Levites not to offer to him in sacrifice animals imperfect and diseased? He meant to tell us in all the ages that we are to offer to God our very best physical condition, and a man who, through irregular or gluttonous eating ruins his health is not offering to God such a sacrifice. Why did Paul write for his cloak at Troas? Why should such a great man as Paul be anxious about a thing so insignificant as an overcoat? It was because he knew that with pneumonia and rheumatism he would not be worth half as much to God and the church as with respiration easy and foot free.

An intelligent Christian man would consider it an absurdity to kneel down at night and pray and ask God's protection while at the same time he kept the windows of his bedroom tight shut against fresh air. He would just as soon think of going out on the bridge between New York and Brooklyn, leaping off, and then praying to God to keep him from getting hurt. Just as long as you defer this whole subject of physical health to the realm of whimsicality or to the pastry cook or to the butcher or to the baker or to the apothecary or to the clothier, you are not acting like a Christian. Take care of all your physical forces—nervous, muscular, bone, brain, cellular tissue—for all you must be brought to judgment.

Smoking your nervous system into fidgets, burning out the coating of your stomach with wine logwooded and strychnined, walking with thin shoes to make your feet look delicate, pinched at the waist until you are nigh cut in two, and neither part worth anything, groaning about sick headache and palpitation of the heart, which you think came from God when they came from your own folly.

What right has any man or woman to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost? What is the ear? Why, it is the whispering gallery of the human soul. What is the eye? It is the observatory God constructed, its telescope sweeping the heavens. What is the hand? An instrument so wonderful that when the Earl of Bridgewater bequeathed in his will $40,000 for treatises to be written on the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, Sir Charles Bell, the great English anatomist and surgeon, found his greatest illustration in the construction of the human hand, devoting his whole book to that subject.

So wonderful are these bodies that God names his own attributes after different parts of them. His omniscience—it is God's eye. His omnipresence—it is God's ear. His omnipotence—it is God's arm. The upholstery of the midnight heavens—it is the work of God's fingers. His life-giving power—it is the breath of the Almighty. His dominion—"the government shall be upon his shoulder." A body so divinely honored and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it.

When it becomes a Christian duty to take care of our health, is not the whole tendency toward longevity? If I toss my watch about recklessly and drop it on the payment and wind it up any time of day or night I happen to think of it, and often let it run down, while you are careful with your watch and never abuse it and wind it up just at the same hour every night and put it in a place where it will not suffer from the violent changes of atmosphere, which watch will last the longer? Common sense answers. Now, the human body is God's watch. You see the hands of the watch, you see the face of the watch; but the beatings of the heart is the ticking of the watch. Oh, be careful and do not let it run down!

Again: I remark that practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it is a protest against dissipations which injure and destroy the health. Bad men and women live a short life. Their sins kill them. I know hundreds of good old men, but I do not know half a dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. Lord Byron died in Missolonghi at 36 years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse that dashed with him into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at Baltimore at 38 years of age. The black raven that alighted on the bust above his chamber door was delirium tremens—

Only this and nothing more.

Napoleon Bonaparte lived only just beyond midlife, then died at St. Helena, and one of his doctors said that his disease was induced by excessive snuffing. The hero of Austerlitz, the man who by one step of his foot in the center of Europe shook the earth, killed by a snuff-box! Oh, how many people we have known who have not lived out half their days because of their dissipations and indulgencies! Now practical religion is a protest against all dissipation of any kind.

"But," you say, "professors of religion have fallen, professors of religion have got drunk, professors of religion have misappropriated trust funds, professors of religion have absconded." Yes; but they threw away their religion before they did their morality. If a man on a White Star line steamer bound for Liverpool in mid-Atlantic jumps overboard and is drowned, is that anything against the White Star line's capacity to take the man across the ocean? And if a man jumps over the gunwale of his religion and goes down never to rise is that any reason for your believing that religion has no capacity to take the man clear through? In the one case, if he had kept to the steamer his body would have been saved; in the other case, if he had kept to his religion his morals would have been saved.

There are aged people who would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the defense and the equipoise of religion. You have no more natural resistance than hundreds of people who lie in the cemeteries to-day, slain by their own vices. The doctors made their case as kind and pleasant as they could, and it was called congestion of the brain or something else, but the snakes and the blue flies that seemed to crawl over the pillow in the sight of the delirious patient showed what was the matter with him. You, the aged Christian man walked along by that unhappy one until you came to the golden pillar of a Christian life. You went to the right; he went to the left. That is all the difference between you. Oh, if this religion is a protest against all forms of dissipation, then it is an illustrious friend of longevity. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Again, religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it takes the worry out of our temporalities. It is not work that kills men, it is worry. When a man becomes a genuine Christian he makes over to God not only his affections but his family, his business, his reputation, his body, his mind, his soul—everything. Industrious he will be, but never worrying, because God is managing his affairs. How can he worry about business when in answer to his prayer God tells him when to buy and when to sell; and if he gain that is best, and if he lose that is best.

Suppose you had a supernatural neighbor who came in and said: "Sir, I am your fast friend; I want you to call on me in every exigency; I could fall back on $20,000,000; I can foresee a panic ten years. I hold the controlling stock in thirty of the best monetary institutions of New York; whenever you are in trouble call on me and I will help you; you can have my money and you can have my influence; here is my hand in pledge for it." How much would you worry about business? Why, you would say: "I'll do the best I can and then I'll depend on my friend's generosity for the rest."

Now more than that is promised to every Christian business man. God says to him: "I own New York and London and St. Petersburg and Pekin, and Australia and California are mine: I can foresee a panic a million years; I have all the resources of the universe, and I am your fast friend; when you get in business trouble or any other trouble call on me and I will help; here is my hand in pledge of omnipotent deliverance." How much should that man worry? Not much. What lion will dare to put his paw on that Daniel? Is there not rest in this? Is there not an eternal vacation in this?

"Oh," you say, "here is a man who asked God for a blessing in a certain enterprise and he lost $3,000 in it. Explain that." I will. Yonder is a factory, and one wheel is going north and the other wheel is going south, and one wheel plays laterally and the other plays vertically. I go to the manufacturer and I say: "Oh, manufacturer, your machinery is a contradiction. Why do you not make all the wheels go one way?" "Well," he says, "I made them to go in opposite directions on purpose and they produce the right result. You go down stairs and examine the carpets we are turning out in this establishment and you will see." I go down on the other floor and I see the carpets, and I am obliged to confess that though the wheels in the factory go in opposite directions, they turn out a beautiful result; and while I am standing there looking at the exquisite fabric an old scripture passage comes into my mind: "All things work together for good to them who love God." Is there not rest in that? Is there not tonic in that? Is there not longevity in that?

Suppose a man is all the time worried about his reputation. One man says he lies, another says he is stupid, another says he is dishonest, and half a dozen printing establishments attack him, and he is in a great state of excitement and worry and fume, and can not sleep; "Man, God is on your side; he will take care but religion comes to him and says: of your reputation; if God be for you who can be against you?" How much should that man worry about his reputation? Not much. If that broker who some years ago in Wall street, after he had lost money, sat down and wrote a farewell letter to his wife before he blew his brains out—if, instead of taking out of his pocket a pistol, he had taken out a well-read new testament there would have been one less suicide. Oh, nervous and feverish people of the world, try this almighty sedative. You will live twenty-five years longer under its soothing power. It is not chloral that you want, or morphine that you want; it is the gospel of Jesus Christ. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Again, practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it removes all corroding care about a future existence. Every man wants to know what is to become of him. If you get on board a rail-train you want to know at what depot it is going to stop; if you get on board a ship you want to know into what harbor it is going to run; and, if you should tell me you have no interest in what is to be your future destiny, I would, in as polite a way as I know how, tell you I did not believe you. Before I had this matter settled with reference to my future existence the question almost worried me into ruined health. The anxieties men have upon this subject put together would make a martyrdom. This is a state of awful unhealthiness. There are people who fret themselves to death for fear of dying.

I want to take the strain off your nerves and the depression off your soul, and I make two or three experiments. Experiment first: When you go out of this world it does not make any difference whether you have been good or bad, or whether you believed truth or error, you will go straight to glory. "Impossible," you say; "my common sense as well as my religion teaches that the bad and the good can not live together forever. You give me no comfort in that experiment." Experiment the second: When you leave this world you will go into an intermediate state where you can get converted and prepared for heaven. "Impossible," you say; "as the tree falleth so it must lie, and I can not postpone to an intermediate state reformation which ought to have been effected in this state." Experiment the third: There is no future world; when man dies that is the last of him. Do not worry about what you are to do in another state of being; you will not do anything. "Impossible," you say; "there is something that tells me that death is not the appendix but the preface; there is something that tells me that on this side of the grave I only get started and that I shall go on forever; my power to think says 'forever,' my affections say 'forever,' my capacity to enjoy or suffer, 'forever.'"

Well, you defeat me in my three experiments. I have only one more to make and if you defeat me in that I am exhausted: A mighty one on a knoll back of Jerusalem one day, the skies filled with forked lightnings and the earth filled with volcanic disturbances, turned His pale and agonized face toward the heavens and said: "I take the sins and sorrows of the ages into my own heart. I am the expiation. Witness earth and heaven and hell, I am the expiation." And the hammer struck Him and the spears punctured Him and heaven thundered: "The wages of sin is death!" "The soul that sinneth it shall die!" "I will by no means clear the guilty!" Then there was silence for half an hour, and the lightnings were drawn back into the scabbard of the sky, and the earth ceased to quiver, and all the colors of the sky began to shift themselves into a rainbow woven out of the falling tears of Jesus, and there was red as of the blood-shedding, and there was blue as of the bruising, and there was green as of the heavenly foliage, and there was orange as of the day-dawn. And along the line of the blue I saw the words: "I was bruised for their iniquities." And along the line of the red I saw the words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." And along the line of the green I saw the words: "The leaves of the tree of life for the healing of the nations." And along the line of the orange I saw the words: "The day-spring from on high hath visited us."

And then I saw the storm was over and the rainbow rose higher and higher until it seemed retreating to another heaven, and planting one column of its colors on one side the eternal hill and planting the other column of its colors on the other side of the eternal hill, it rose upward and upward, "and behold, there was a rainbow about the throne."

Accept that sacrifice and quit worrying. Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of this truth. Religion is sunshine, that is health. Religion is fresh air and pure water, they are healthy. Religion is warmth, that is healthy. Ask all the doctors and they will tell you that a quiet conscience and pleasant anticipations are hygienic. I offer you perfect piece now and hereafter.

What do you want in the future world? Tell me and you shall have it. Orchards? There are the trees with twelve manner of fruits, yielding fruits every month. Water scenery? There is the river of life, from under the throne of God, clear as crystal, and the sea of glass mingled with fire. Do you want music? There is the oratorio of the creation led on by Adam, and the oratorio of the Red sea led on by Moses, and the oratorio of the Messiah led on by St. Paul, while the archangel, with swinging baton controls the 144,000 who make up the orchestra.

Do you want reunion? There are your dead children waiting to kiss you, waiting to embrace you, waiting to twist garlands in your hair. You have been accustomed to open the door on this side the sepulchre. I open the door on the other side the sepulchre. You have been accustomed to walk in the wet grass on the top of the grave. I show you the under side of the grave; the bottom has fallen out and the long ropes with which the pall bearers let down your dead, let them clear through into heaven.

Glory be to God for this robust, healthy religion. It will have a tendency to make you live long in this world, and in the world to come you will have eternal life. "With long life will I satisfy him."

About Queens.

Queen Victoria has now reigned over England longer than any monarch but two—Henry III. and George III. She overtook Queen Elizabeth six years ago and has outdone Edward III., who only reigned 148 days over half a century. If she lives a few years longer Victoria will have reigned longer than any royal personage of history.

Queen Marguerite of Italy shows more and more fondness for American literature, and, it is said, gets all the leading magazines published in the United States.

Queen Olga of Greece is practical, dresses plainly, and goes in for domestic ecomony, etc., even making her own bonnets, it is said.

Dagnar of Russia, the Princess of Wales' sister, is said to be politically smart, though not intellectual otherwise. Like all her sisters she is clever with her needle, as they had to make their own clothes before their father got to be king.

The Queen of Spain recently, after the performance, called Sarah Bernhardt into the box and gave her a bouquet tied in ribbon and secured by a splendid sapphire mounted with diamonds.

Marie, the daughter of the Empress of Austria, is about to marry Prince Ruprecht of Bavaria, who is, according to loyal Jacobites, the heir apparent to the English throne.

Victoria of Germany, it is said, tastes portions of every article of food intended for the Emperor, and superintends the preparation of most of it herself.

Olga of Greece is the most beautiful Queen of Europe and is sister-in-law of the Empress of Russia and the Princess of Wales.

The Queen of Denmark is intensely deaf, but fond of music, and has a big and powerful organ that she can hear.

Elizabeth of Austria has developed an unfortunate skin disease and wears a veil continually.

Isabella, ex-Queen of the Spaniards when she appears abroad wears a costume much the same as that of a nun.

The Queen of England's grandson, George "Collars and Cuffs," is irreverent. He was dancing at a ball recently with a pretty but plebeian partner when his brother called him to account. "You can go and hum God save grand-mother," was his retort, "I'll dance with whom I please,"

Old Eugenie, ex-Empress, is said to have developed strange idiosyncracies, besides being a recluse. One is a tendency to Spiritualism and a belief that she can communicate with her dead Prince Imperial. It is well understood that she intends to make Princess Beatrice of England her heiress.

The Queen Regent of Spain chooses the word daily for the countersign without which no one is admitted to the palace by the many guards. This is communicated to the highest military official, who happens to be Marshal Campo, who proclaimed Alfonso King.—Philadelphia Times.

America and Amerigo.

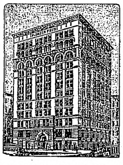
Public Opinion.

Amerigo Vespucci, the Florentine navigator, has usually been credited with conferring his name upon the western world, a circumstance which has caused no end of regret to many historians who argue that it should have been called Columbia in honor of the illustrious discoverer. The researches of the present author (Thomas de St. Bris, in his "Discovery of the Origin of the Name of Amercia") seem to show the name America was derived from the native name of Central America and the northern portions of South America, which it is well known were among the very first localities visited and colonized by the Spaniards. The name was variously written by early navigators, who adapted what seemed to each the nearest imitation of the native word. Thus we have an Ama-Amercia. To this was frequently added the raca, Ameroco, Maraca, Moraca, and finally native word "pana," which, according to Sir Walter Raleigh, is the equivalent of country. It seems strange that these facts should have remained so long in obscurity, although it is perhaps not less remarkable than that the Norse discoveries during the tenth century should only recently begin to attract attention. These names actually occur on the maps and charts of the Spaniards, and the author has given a reproduction of one of them, showing the geographical knowledge available during the early part of the fifteenth century. On the whole, this pamphlet, the substance of which was given by the author before the American Geographical Society, contains considerable interesting information relating to the earlier history of the Americans.

A BIG PRINTING OFFICE.

The Wonderful Structure Now Being Erected by the Pioneer Press Company—A Combination of Strength and Beauty.

Yenowine's Sunday News: The great West is nothing if not progressive. A year or so ago the St. Paul Globe astonished its Eastern contemporaries by erecting a magnificent ten-story newspaper building. The PIONEER PRESS does not propose to be eclipsed by its young and vigorous rival, and is preparing to erect a structure about twice as large and two stories higher than the Globe building. Ground has just been broken at the corner of Fourth and Robert streets for the PIONEER PRESS building, which is to be completed in less than a year at a cost of $700,000, and which will be the tallest and by all odds the finest newspaper structure in the United States. The accompanying illustration of the building will give the reader a fair idea of its size and appearance. It will cover a lot 124 feet square, will have twelve full stories and basement, the height from the curbstone to the roof being 170 feet. The will be constructed of stone, brick, glass and iron. It will be entirely fireproof, the only wood used being the interior finishings. The style of architecture is in keeping with the massive solidity of the structure. The design shows a successful combination of strength and beauty. The first two stories will be built of red granite, the remaining ten of pressed red brick, with rich terra cotta ornamentation. From the ground to the roof there will be a court thirty feet square, covered by glass, richly embellished on all sides. All of the interior pillars and beams will be of iron, the floors deadened, and everything will be covered with fire proofing. The great building will have every known contrivance for comfort. All engines boilers and lighting and heating plants will be in a separate building. There will be our elevators, the building entirely lighted by electricity, and a marvelous equipment of presses is being manufactured for the use of the publishers, who are wealthy enough to erect such a building. The paper proper will occupy the basement, the first and the eleventh and twelfth floors for its own uses. The remainder of the building will be used for office purposes. On the the top floor and elegant club room will be fitted up for the exclusive use of the employes of the paper—in all a force of about six hundred men and boys.



PROPOSED PIONEER PRESS BUILDING

Crops Looking Better.

A general summary of the present crop outlook of the Northwest would state that the average condition is good. The past week has been most favorable for all kinds of grain, and while in some localities wheat is from a week to ten days late, the average reports are cheerful and satisfactory in tenor. Reports of an inferior stand of grain are scattering, and the causes producing such a result are purely of a local nature. In a few sections high winds have blown the soil from the roots of the young grain, but these few localities have not been favored with the warm rains which have of late so generally prevailed, and the light, sandy nature of the soil accounts largely for such conditions. Reports gathered from different points on main and branch lines of the St. Paul Minneapolis & Manitoba railway are to the effect that wheat is in as good an average condition as could be hoped for, and that the weather of the past week has been all that could be desired. The prevailing cold weather following seeding was not damaging to wheat, but on the contrary caused it to stool well, and in but a few ISOLATED LOCALITIES has it been drowned out. It is, moreover, owing to the backwardness of spring, and the prevailing cold weather of the early season that no trouble from the chinch bug is anticipated. Oats are doing fairly well, and the increase of acreage large. Corn is late. Advices from Brainerd, Minn., are to the effect that a late rain has greatly benefited crops in that section. In Olmsted county, this state, small grain are coming up evenly, with the exception of some barley and oats which failed to germinate. Late sown grain here is all doing well. Corn is planted between showers. From Madison, Dak., it is learned that abundant rains have insured a large crop of small grain and grass, but corn is backward. Huron, Dak., reports corn as coming up, and wheat in the best condition. Around Winona young grain was nipped by a sharp frost some ten days ago. Taken altogether the situation at present of growing grain can be considered satisfactory, with a marked improvement over that of ten days ago.

The Crop Outlook.

There was some reduction in seeding the winter wheat area in some states, though the average breadth of all was but slightly reduced. In the East and South there was no material loss of area from freezing, but in several Western states it was considerable. The apparent reduction of breadth of winter wheat, as compared with that of last year, is about one and three-fourths millions of acres. The percentage of reduction for the entire winter wheat region is placed at 7.2 per cent, in comparison with the reduced area harvested last year. There has been an increase of area of spring wheat in Dakota and in the territories further west, but a decrease in Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, making an average decrease for the spring wheat region of 1 per cent. The area in wheat is apparently slightly below 36,000,000 acres. There is slight local change of condition of winter wheat, some improvement in New York and Pennsylvania, and marked decline in Missouri, and minor changes of status elsewhere, making the average 73.3 against 73.1 in May. The loss by overflow of the Mississippi in Illinois offsets in part the improvement in other counties. In Ohio Indiana, Michigan and Kansas the average condition is nearly the same as in May. The acreage of barely is nearly the same as last year. New York and Wisconsin are credited with an increase of 1 per cent, Minnesota with 2, Dakota with 10. Iowa, Missouri and California report a small reduction. The condition of barley averages 88.9. It is only 80 in California. The area of rye is practically the same as last year. Condition, 93.9

Shot by Train Robbers.

American Messenger J. Zimmerman and Baggagemaster Joe Ketchum were alone together in the express and baggage car of the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis & Chicago railway. Zimmerman, when the train left Delhi, a station twelve miles west of Cincinnati called Ketchum's attention to some tramps that he saw through the glass window of the car door leading to the front platform next to the locomotive tender. Both men arose and went toward the front door. When within ten feet of it the tramps began firing through the glass window. Ketchum fell, shot in four places, two balls entering his abdomen, one his breast, and one his left shoulder. Zimmerman tried to draw his pistol, but it stuck in his hip pocket, and he retreated to the rear platform of the car, where he met the conductor. The latter pulled the bell rope and stopped the train. While this was going on, one of the tramps climbed on the tender where he was met by the fireman and engineer and knocked stiff by two blows from a monkeywrench. The engineer and fireman rolled him off the tender while the train was at full speed. Before he was thrown overboard, however, a second robber attempted to climb on the tender, but he weakened and dodged back at the sight of the prostrate form of his companion. Before the train stopped, more than one robber was seen to jump off and disappear in the darkness. All of them wore masks completely covering their faces. Not a word was spoken by the robbers during the entire affray, and not a shot was fired at them. Mr. Zimmerman and the conductor think they fired not less than fifteen shots. Zimmerman says he saw four men distinctly and that all of them wore masks. The did not get inside of the car, and so have become robbers and murderers without pay. The police mounted and on foot, aided by a large force of citizens, are patrolling the river front and scouring the country to intercept the scoundrels. Joseph Ketchum is now under the care of Surgeons Muscraft and Dandridge. It appears his bladder has been penetrated by one ball and there is no hope of his recovery. The man who tumbled off the tender has not yet been found. Two suspects have been arrested.

Dakota Firemen's Contest.

Huron, Dakota, had a firemen's tournament and contest, which created much interest. The single men's coupling contest, fifty-foot run and couple was first called with four starters: Higby in five and one-third seconds, Fox five and one-half seconds both of Yankton, won first and second money, Turner No. 2 of Huron ran in sixty-one seconds. No time was allowed because they failed to cary the required amount of hose. Artesian of Hitchcock came next with no time because they failed to connect at the hydrant. Enterprize No. 3 of Huron trotted over the course in fifty-three seconds, made sure coupling, and took the prize. De Smet hooks led off in the contest for Green hooks in fifty-three and three-fifths seconds Scotland followed in sixty-two and a quarter. The 100-yard foot race was won by three Aberdeen men, Peper in ten and three-fifths seconds, Atherton in ten and four-tenths, Huff in eleven and one-fourth, and Langslott of Mitchell fourth in eleven and one-half. There were seventeen entries, but only eleven started. For the best drilled company Liberty Hose and Pride Hooks, two juvenile companies of Huron, were the only ones to answer the call, and so divided the money. The remainder of the contests on the programme followed. The championship ladderman's contest was to run fifty feet and climb a twenty-four-foot ladder. Following are the contestants and time; Langlev of Huron, 51-9 seconds; Coquellette of Miller, 51-12; Smith of Miller, 51-6; Elliott of Aberdeen, 51-7. Purse of $40 and badge—first, $20 and badge; second, $20. Champion hose cart contest, Mitchell took first money and cart in 44 1-5 seconds; Yankton, 45 2-5 seconds; Huntley Hose company ran with one length of extra hose in 47 seconds, and Turner No. 2 of Huron ran in 53 seconds, but failed to couple.

Minneapolis Water.

The report of the health officer of Minneapolis, Minn., attributes the winter cholera which prevails in that city to its wretched water. His conclusions are the result of careful post-mortem examinations where death was said to be from winter cholera. In many of those cases the diagnosis was wrong. He estimates that 40 per cent of the population have been affected by the disease. He states that his investigations lead him to great caution and these investigations, assisted by Dr. C. U. Hewitt, of the state board of health, led him to suspect the water supply as the most likely source of the disease. He accordingly sent the bowels of case No. 1 to Dr. T. M. Pruden, of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. Dr. Pruden submits a report in which he finds that winter cholera is caused by bacteria from poluted food or water. These bacelli resembles typhoid fever germs and were found in the stomach and intestines of winter cholera victims in enormous numbers. They are white and plump, with rounded ends, and show great activity. Rabbits inoculated with them died in from twelve to twenty hours. Dr. Pruden examined water from the Minneapolis supply. In samples of a cubic centimeter of water, which is less than a third of a teaspoonful, bacteria were found as follows: West side pumping station, 686 bacteria; East side, 8,824; 212 Nicollet, 12,907; 210 Plymouth avenue, 472; 1,400 Seventh street south, 4,436; 328 Eighth avenue northeast, 15,485.

A young man crept under the floor of the residence of William Froggart of Camden, near Thamesville, Can., to shoot a cat. The ball passed clean through the leg of Mrs. Froggart, who happened to be standing in the kitchen above.

A man named Munchthaler and his wife were found in a cigar store at Detroit, Mich., dying from the effects of pistol shots. Munchthaler had shot the woman three times, and himself in the mouth, but dying five minutes later. Cause is unknown, but probably the result of a quarrel.

Three laborers, Daniel Lyon, Thomas Purcell and Fred Moeck, were killed by the caving in of a bank where they were excavating for a warehouse foundation in Omaha, Neb.

The mystery of the "mail car murder" in Maine, is gradually being cleared up. It is rumored that the two mail clerks have made statements, but the rumor cannot be substantiated. Hayes is reported to have said that a sudden quarrel came up between Sellins and Sinclair about the handling of some mail at Waterville, and both men were exceedingly angry. Hard names were called by each man and blows followed. Suddenly in a fit of ungovernable rage, Sellin seized a large knife, which was used by the head clerk in cutting twine, and made a plungeat Jerry Sinclair, burying it deep in the side of his breast and killing him.

While boating on Elkham river Nebraska A. M. Norton editor of the Norfolk Daily News, and Mrs. Harman Beerecke were carried against a tree, and upset. A young man named Guy Washburn, a son of Quartermaster L. C. Washburn, who was in another boat, came to the rescue, when he too upset and drowned. His body has been recovered. The others were saved.

John Zachar, Jr., son of a wealthy Bohemian farmer living near Racine, Wis., has not tasted food for twenty-five days. During the greater portion of that time he has done arduous farm work, but has now grown so weak that anything more laborious than light chores exausts him. He talks rationally and gives no other reason for his abstinence than he is not hungry. Two doctors have been treating him, but their efforts to induce him to take food have thus far proven unavailing. It is thought his self-imposed fast is a pronounced symptom of insanity, although there are no other indications of mental weakness. Insanity has run in the family for several generations. Zachar is fully six feet in height and has been a very powerful man. His clothes which fitted him a month ago now hang loosely on him and his limbs and body have shrunken away to a marked degree. The doctors do not think he can live long.

Chief Gill of Cincinnati received a dispatch from Lieut. Schmidt at Delhi, saying that the Big Four desperadoes and mail robbers had been located in an empty house on the Muddy creek, about a mile from the train robbery. Three men are in the house nursing the fourth one, the latter having been injured by being thrown from the train. A patrol wagon and 12 men left immediately for the place, and under the direction of Chief Gill have surrounded the house, and an attempt will be made to capture the desperadoes. It is more than probable that they will not be taken without a fight, as the robbers are heavily armed.

The World Not so Very Large.

From the Washington Post.

The world is growing smaller every day! Three gentlemen were standing together in the East Room of the White House at the last State reception. Richly dressed and beautiful women were thronging into that magnificent parlor from the Green Room, having "been through" as the expression is for a presentation to the President in the Blue Room. The social mill was in furious operation that evening, and an enormous grist was being ground out.

Suddenly a medium-sized, facinating lady from New York, in an elegant and becoming costume, emerged from the hopper. She was the wife of a high railway official in that city. The three gentlemen glanced at her. No one of the three knew that either of the others had ever seen her before."

"Ah! said Browne, "the last time I saw her I was pouring sand into her shoes at Long Branch."

"Indeed!" said White. "The last time I met her was at the Hotel Continental in Paris, when she presented me to Clara Louise Kellogg."

"And that reminds me," said Greene, "that the last time I saw her I was seated by her side in her carriage, driving up Fifth-ave. for a turn in Central Park."

And then the three gentlemen looked at each other, and shook hands, and laughed. How small this world is.

Women Athletes.

Many people have been at a loss to know where the female athletes learn the art by which they earn a livelihood. A professor has a private gymnasium in an uptown street at which many of the queens of the air are instructed in the science of hanging by their toes and going through various other acts well known to the frequenters of the circus and the variety theatre. A reporter for a New York paper had a long talk with this professor on the subject a day or two ago. When he entered the studio he found the professor instructing two young women in trapeze manœuvres. The visitor was invited into a private room, as it is against the rules for any one to be present while pupils are taking lessons. The rooms were decorated with potographs of the shining lights of the profession whom the professer has fitted for the business. After the lesson was over, the professor took the scribe through the different apartments. "I am the only man in the city," said he, "who instructs ladies in the art of performing on the trapeze."

"I suppose a person must be very young and supple at the first start to make anything like a good acrobat?"

"That's where you are entirely wrong, sir. Any woman can become a good performer after a proper course of training, if she be healthy and not too stout. It is all mechanical, and can be acquired only by constant practice. I have ladies come to me who are anything but graceful, and by following my advice and suggestions closely they have become first-class performers and are now earning good salaries. Many fail because they can't stand the hardship inseparable from the first few days' practice. After the initial lesson they decline to take the rest of the course. Nine persons out of every ten give it up after the first lesson. If they would only keep on the pain would gradually disappear. The first lesson consists of hanging by the hands, and swinging to and fro across the room, which I have them to do in order to satisfy myself of their strength. They generally swing across twice and fall upon a feather bed. The next figure is to hang from the bar by the hands. After they have gone so far, they take hold of the ropes and slide up into a sitting position. After a few moment's rest I make them get down by reversing the motion.

"When I have progressed thus far, I teach them to hang by their knees. This is not quite so difficult as the previous lesson. After they have gone through this motion several times, they feel like going home. When a woman has gone as far as this without complaining much, it is pretty safe to say she will succeed in the profession she has chosen. Most of them think every muscle in the body has been severed."

"How long does it require a woman to become proficient?"

That depends entirely upon the pupil; but I can generally tell what the pupil will amount to as a performer after I have given her two lessons."

"Do you ever have any accidents?"

"Very seldom; I always look out for them. Slim women generally make the most scientific performers."

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

A man with a weakness for statistics has made the calculation that a society girl in dancing eighteen waltzes of ordinary duration goes a distance of about fourteen miles.

Julia Ward Howe and Queen Victoria are exactly the same age. They both celebrate their sixty-ninth birthday this month. The former achieved greatness; the latter had greatness thrust upon her.

Last fall a bug flew into the ear of Henry Bolton, of Frederick township, Montgomery county, Pa., rendering him entirely deaf on that side. A few days ago the bug dropped out and his hearing almost immediately returned.

Miss Kate Bishop, an actress in Australia, wears a silver bracelet on her left arm night and day. Her only sister locked it there before she sailed for America to get married. The ship went down with all hands, and the key is with the drowned girl.

The steamer Iowa, at Boston, on her last trans-Atlantic trip, was surrounded by a school of whales, which indulged in all sorts of capers, until finally one of the bolder of the monsters unwisely attempted to cross the vessel's bow. It was completely cut in two.

A correspondent of a Kentucky newspaper writes that he recently visited the birth place of Abraham Lincoln, in Larue county, and found the neighborhood the most unpromising locality in the state, the land immediately surrounding it being almost as barren as a desert.

Extended observations at Paris and at Munich indicate that the sanitary condition of a locality depends on the amount of water contained in the ground. The years in which there has been a large quantity of ground water present have invariably been the healthiest, while those in which there has been a smaller quantity have invariably been the unhealthiest.

A few days ago a Mr. Conti, of Richmond, Va., noticed that his infant son was covered on the neck and arms with a number of red spots, and he subsequently discovered that the child had been bitten by a large spider. From that time the infant's limbs began to swell, and in a few days the little sufferer died in great agony.

The tongue will sometimes make the most awkward slips. It is told of a clergyman in one of the towns near Boston that he had given him to read from the pulpit an announcement that "the Bellingham praying band" would conduct at the evening meeting; but by some strange perversity of the unruly member the congregation was astounded with the annoucement that there would be a service by the "Prayingham belly-band."

The dead letter office received 4,808,000 letters last year, for about a third of which owners were discovered. Money to the value of $1,795,764 was found in 19,588 letters. These figures show the necessity of care in directing letters and seeing that they are stamped, as well as indicating on the outside who sends them. The return stamp, issued by a Chicago concern, offers a convenient method of identification to those who do not wish to put their names on envelopes.

Mrs. E. O. Stanard, a prominent woman of St. Louis, Mo., is looking for a heroine. A few days ago Mrs. Stanard was riding in her carriage with her two little daughters. The horses took fright and ran away. As the carriage was nearing an open sewer on Elliott avenue a young girl about sixteen years of age sprang from a buggy in which she was seated, and seizing the runaway horses by the head, saved the lives of Mrs. Stanard and her daughters. The plucky girl disappeared so quickly after her brave deed that her name could not be ascertained.

The theory is held by Prof. Mendeleef, of Russia, that petroleum is produced by water which penetrates the earth's crust and comes in contact with the glowing carbides of metal, especially of iron. The water is decomposed into its constituent gases, the oxygen uniting with the iron, while the hydrogen takes up the carbon and ascends to a higher region, where part of it is condensed into mineral oil, and part remains as natural gas, to escape wherever, and whenever it can find an outlet. If this assumption is correct, and a sufficient store of metallic carbides is contained in the earth's interior, petroleum may continue to be formed almost indefinitely and continue to yield a supply of fuel long after the supply of coal has become exhausted. Prof. Mendeleef supports his views by producing artificial petroluem in a manner similar to that by which he believes the natural product is made.

THE FIFTH MINNESOTA.

A Lively Contest in this Congressional District Before S. G. Comstock Gets the Nomination.

It took two days of hard work and forty-five ballots before the Fifth Minnesota republican congressional convention was able to agree upon a candidate to succeed Knute Nelson. Though the struggle was long and vigorous, the best of feeling prevailed and when S. G. Comstock won the first prize, all his competitors cheerfully extended their congratulations on the first ballot the vote stood Barto 26; Buckman 15; Comstock 18; Corliss 13; Stearns 27. These figures changed but slightly till the 27th ballot, when two new candidates, appeared in the persons of C. H. Graves and C. F. Kindred, the vote of the former running up to fourteen, but that of the latter dropping off. On the forty-fifth ballot, which nominated Comstock, the vote stood: Barto 17; Comstock 50; Corliss 15; Stearns 1; Graves 14.

THE CANDIDATE.

S. G. Comstock

Hon. S. G. Comstock was born in Argyle, Me., May 9, 1842, and here were passed the early days of his boyhood. After attending the common school for some years he entered the seminary at Kent Hill, Me., a classmate of A. J. Blethen and W. S. Pattee, who was recently made dean of the law faculty at the university. He graduated from this institution in 1866 and then spent a year reading law with Judge Humphrey of Bangor, Me. During this time he was a diligent student, entering the law department of the University of Michigan in the fall of 1867; he graduated with honors the following spring. He first hung out his shingle in Omaha, where he practiced a year with varying success.

In 1871 he settled at Morehead and again began the practice at law. His ability was soon recognized by the Clay county bar, and he became a successful candidate for the office of county attorney, a position which he filled with distinction for several years. Elected to the legislature in 1874 he served in one branch or the other ever since, with the exception of one year. He was elected to the state senate in 1886. Some six weeks ago he retired from the law and became the senior partner in the firm of Comstock & White, real estate dealers, and now known as the Northwestern Land company. He has been very successful as a business man, having acquired a fortune of $200,000 since his residence in Moorhead. In his political career he has been equally fortunate.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, We have heretofore demanded certain remedial legislation looking to the equitable distribution of the fruits of labor, the just regulation of the subject of railroad traffic, both in state and interstate commerce, to a fair and equitable point where the interest of the railroad companies and the interest of the shippers should be fairly and justly considered and to the full and unrestricted rights of the shipper to reach the markets of the world untrammeled by any unjust burden; and whereas, such legislation as the experience of the past would suggest and in the light of such experience, has already been secured through the efforts of the Republican party,

Resolved, That we demand such additional legislation as is necessary to fully and fairly adjust the relation of shippers and carriers to the end that the shipper shall be allowed to ship at a fair and reasonable rate, which rate shall be based upon the actual cost of construction and operating expenses, and that efforts of shippers to secure an open market shall not be trammeled by any unjust or unreasonable changes; and that the shipper shall exercise the right to transfer at all points of railroad lines without any unjust charges therefor; and that this principle be engrafted upon what is known as the interstate commerce law, and to secure such desired legislation and the enforcement thereof we pledge the earnest efforts of the Republican party.

Resolved, That we insist upon a material and judicious reduction of the tariff, especially when it bears heavily upon the producing and agricultural interests, and demand that congress shall cease trifling with this most important subject. We regard the so-called Mills bill, as presented in congress, as a subterfuge, designed only to deceive, and fraught with mischief, bearing upon its face the unmistakable evidence of having been prepared solely in the spirit of sectional interest, carefully guarding the interests of one section of the country at the expense of another; and we regret that the party in power refuse to meet the question of tariff reduction in a fair and manly spirit. We hold the Democratic party responsible for the war, of which the present tariff was a necessary outgrowth, and in view of the failure of the party to reform the tariff after being in possession of the lower house of congress for several years we cannot but regard their promises of reform as mere pretense, unworthy of any respect or serious consideration, and point to the fact that all material reduction in the tariff has been secured through the efforts of the Republican party, while the history of the Democratic party upon this subject is a succession of broken pledges. We confidently appeal to the people to intrust this important subject to the care of the Republican party.

Resolved, That we hope for the restoration of a Republican majority in congress; that Dakota may have justice and no longer be denied admission to the Union for partisan reasons.

Resolved, That we are in favor of opening, as soon as practicable, all the Indian reservations in the Fifth district, allotting land in severalty to the Indians now residing thereon, and disposing of the remainder to actual settlers and purchasers on such terms as congress may deem best.

Resolved, That we highly appreciate the services of our congressman, Hon. Knute Nelson, and feel a pride in the honorable distinction so justly attained by him. He has clearly apprehended his duties and faithfully and ably performed them. No personal schemes have met with his favor, but he has labored industriously in the interests of the whole people. We heartily approve of his earnest efforts to regulate interstate commerce and to secure a reform and reduction of the tariff, and his action therein has been in accord with the plainly expressed will of the Republican party of this district, as enunciated in the platforms upon which he has been elected, and his constituents consent to his retirement as congressman only for the reason that he absolutely declines a re-election.

The tariff plank did not call forth as hearty applause as did the resolutions that the Indian reservation should be thrown open to settlement and that Dakota should be admitted. Col. Graves, chairman of the committee on resolutions, said to the PIONEER PRESS correspondent that there was a good deal of talk about a high license resolution, but it was finally agreed not to mention anything upon which a member of congress could not have an opportunity to vote.

THE BOYS IN BLUE.

They are Having Pleasant Gatherings and a Good Time in Various Places.

The Veterans re-union at La Crosse, Wis., has been a complete success in every particular. There was a heavy rain, but no wind and it caused no interference with the men in camp.

There are present as follows: First battery, 47; Fourteenth infantry, 72; Second cavalry, 71; La Crosse county and veterans not belonging to any organization, about two hundred; La Crosse and Lemonweir valley, about four hundred. These, with their bands and citizens in line, made a procession of about one thousand people. Eleven old battle flags were carried in line, and as they passed were often greeted by throngs on the sidewalks with bared heads. On arriving at the park the La Crosse and Lemonweir association held their annual meeting. The next place of meeting is fixed at Viroqua. Col. E. M. Rogers was elected commander, C. K. Erwin, officer of the day; H. C. Goshen, quartermaster; C. Bebel, surgeon; and a vice president from each post. Next in order was dinner, which was served in a building seating about six hundred. All the veterans were fed and then the towns people, to the number of two or three thousand. In the afternoon exercises were held in the park.

Resolutions were adopted demanding of congress a repeal of the arrears of pensions act and favoring the passage of the service pension law proposed by the National Tribune.

ENCAMPMENTS IN MINNESOTA.

The largest assemblage ever gathered at Wabasha, Minn., was in attendance at the interstate G. A. R. reunion. The number present is estimated at 11,000. The principal address was delivered by Commander in Chief J. P. Rea. The military movements of the Mullen guards and several visiting military companies were of a very excellent character, and the dress parade of the veterans was one of the most interesting and marked features. The air was alive with music from brass and martial bands.

A large delegation of veterans from the Charles Coleman post of Durand, Wis., also from Benjamin Allen post of Waterville and detachments from Rock Elm and Mondovi posts, the Woman's Relief corps and Sons of Veterans turned out in large numbers to attend the reunion of interstate encampment at Wabasha, Minn.

At the encampment at Morris, Minn., the boys were addressed by Gov. A. R. McGill and others. A camp fire was held and the veterans were received by Commander-in-Chief Rea and Department Commander Ege. The fireman's tournament and the trial of the steam fire engine, followed by boat races. Dress parade took place and at night there were dramatic entertainments at the opera house and Agency hall, and dancing at the pavillion.

DAMAGED BY FLOOD.

Never in the memory of the oldest settler has the destruction from high water been so great as at present in the vicinity of Cloquet, along the line of the St. Paul & Duluth road. A water spout burst over the territory and immediately the waters in the St. Louis and tributaries began to rise, covering the tracks for miles, in some places to the depth of eighteen inches. One of the booms of the C. N. Nelson Lumber company broke, but the logs were nearly all caught. The remaining boom of the Nelson Lumber company of Cloquet broke and the logs passed down the river, clearing the Thomson bridge by only ten feet. By many persons it is said that the second boom, which contained upwards of 60,000,000 feet of logs, first gave away, and the massive force they exerted snapped the Posey Island boom, where there were 20,000,000 feet. The water, after the booms broke, rose two feet, seeming to drain off the great overflowed tract of land above. It was but a few minutes after the breaking of the booms before the bulk of the logs were gone. They traveled down the river a great mass, piled in places away above the water, and carrying all before them. When they reached Thompson and the Dalles there, an hour after breaking loose, they scattered as they rushed over the Rocky Channel and piled up all along the banks, the sight as they struck the Dalles and its raging waters was a wonderful one. It is feared that when they came they would first jam there, then afterward sweep down in a solid mass and carry away the iron bridge of the St. Paul & Duluth railroad, but that fear turned out groundless, as the bridge was not hurt at all. It took but two hours for the 80,000,000 feet to pass Thompson. The loss of the lumbermen is enormous. As near as can now be estimated it will reach nearly half a million dollars and may run over that, and of course on all this great loss there is no insurance at all. The loss to the Knife Falls Boom company and the lumbermen there will be $150,000 or more, and on the logs swept away perhaps nearly $300,000 more. The log slide of their upper mill was swept down the stream. One span of the water power company's railroad bridge and two small wooden bridges there, were also carried down stream. The Colquet Lumber company estimate their loss at 35,000,000 feet, which cost to put in about $350,000.

Two Murderers Hanged.

Gaddy and Rocette, the murderers of Settler McLeish at Wolsley, N. W. T., were launched into eternity at Regina, Rocette bore up without flinching and spoke on the scaffold. He said he was no murderer and did not regret having a rope about his neck, but was sorry to die. Gaddy held up well also. He was attended by Reverends Gregory and Daniels, Episcopalians. He appeared penitent for the crime, and received the sacrament the day before his execution. Rocette was attended by Fathers Graton and Leduc. When the bolt shot they dropped and died instantly, not a muscle of either moving. Both slept well during the night, and ate a good breakfast. Rocette especially. He ate eight eggs and a number of slices of toast, and drank wine. On Sunday night, May 29, the stable of Hector McLeish, a farmer, was broken into and a pony stolen. A party of citizens started in pursuit next day, overtaking the thieves the following day, when in an encounter McLeish was shot and subsequently died of his wound. The thieves were half-breeds, Gaddy and Rocette. The pursuing party found out that the half-breeds were concealed in a house about a mile from Wolsley. McLeish and a mounted policeman walked out late at night to keep guard and report which way they went if they left the house, and the rest of the party would come out at daylight. They tried to make the capture alone. The night was very dark, and as they were about entering the front door the policeman was knocked down from behind and became insensible. He had a revolver in his hand at the time which he dropped. As McLeish turned to grapple with the assailant another half-breed rushed out of the house, picking up the policeman's revolver and shot McLeish once in the back and once in the left arm. The desperadoes then decamped, it is supposed for Crooked Lakes. Prisoners were tracked from point to point, but always evaded their pursuers, and finally escaped across the line, where they were taken in custody by American authorities and brought over the line for trial a few months ago.

Wholesale Poisoning.

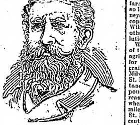
One of the most horrible poisoning cases that Philadelphia has ever known has been discovered, and another murderess lodged in jail. John Whitling aged thirty-eight years, his alleged wife, aged forty, his alleged daughter Bertha, aged nine years and his son Willie, aged two years, lived in the rear end of 1227 Cadwallader street. John Whitling died on March 20, Bertha on April 25 and Willie on May 26. The doctors in attendance gave certificates of death respectively for "inflamation of the bowels, gastric fever and congestion of the bowels." There was an insurance on the lives of each, ranging from $200 down to $60. The coroner accidentally hearing of the case, and having his suspicions aroused, had the bodies exhumed and a chemical analysis made of the intestines, and found arsenic in all. The woman was sent for by the coroner and made a full confession. She procured "Rough on Rats." She gave the children the poison and then summoned a physician, but did not administer the medicine prescribed. She said she could not go out washing with a baby and resolved to get rid of Willie; that she was afraid Bertha would grow up a bad woman and she had better die, and concluded that if she poisoned them all at once she would be found out. She came to Philadelphia in 1872, and has lived in a house of assignation both there and in Chicago. She is frivolous in manner, and was only brought to the consciousness of her position when confronted with the evidence of her crime. When she finished her confession she said her conscience was clear and that she would meet her dead children in heaven.

Mrs. Sheridan, mother of Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, died at her home at Somerset, Ohio, after a long illness. Mrs. Sheridan was born in County Cavan, Ireland, came to the United States in 1828, and to Ohio 1832. She was never robust in appearance. Her stature was small. She lived in the home which the general purchased for the family prior to the war.

DEATH OF THE EMPEROR.

Germany's Beloved Monarch, Frederick III., Yields to Insidious Disease.

Emperor Frederick III., died at Berlin at 10 o'clock on the 16th of June. He had been dying for some days, though he retained his consciousness until within a few hours of his death. As soon as it became evident that the end was near, the empress caused the royal family to be summoned. At 8 o'clock all gathered around the bedside. Dr. Koegel, court chaplain, who had been summoned by telegraph from Ems did not arrive in time to administer the last sacrament. Dr. Persius therefore, officiated in this ceremony. Pastor Rogge was also present in the death chamber. During the administering of the sacrament, and even to within fifteen minutes before his death, the emperor appeared to be quite conscious. He showed by the expression of his eyes and by the movements of his eye lids that he still recognized all who approached the bedside, relatives and others. A number of officials who had been summoned early in the morning reached the palace before death had taken place. Among those present at the time the emperor died were Count von Stolberg-Wernigerode, Gen. von Albedyll, Count Eulenberg, Gen. Rauch, Count Radolinski, Gen. Pape and Gen. Lindequist.



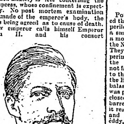
THE DEAD EMPEROR.

Prince Bismarck did not go to Potsdam from Berlin after the meeting of the ministerial council, where he formally announced the decease of the emperor. By order of the Evangelical church council the bells will be tolled at specified hours for fourteen days succeeding in all the Protestant churches of the kingdom. Prince Bismarck and all the members of the ministry, the aides-de-camp and the officers on duty in the palace were admitted to the room in which the remains lie.

A touching scene occurred at the bedside while the emperor's life was passing away. Bismarck had called to bid his dying master a last farewell. The emperor was thoroughly conscious, and taking the hand of the aged chancellor in his feeble grasp, and motioning to the empress to draw nearer he took her hand and joined it with that of Bismarck, thus giving a silent and pathetic token of his desire for a reconciliation of all differences between his wife and the prime minister.

EFFECTS IN BERLIN.

The effect of the emperor's death in Berlin was instantaneous. In a couple of hours the bright summer look of the streets was changed. Women appeared clad in black and men with bands of crape tied about their arms. Many shops were closed. Much anxiety is felt concerning the new empress, whose confinement is expected daily. No post mortem examination will be made of the emperor's body, the doctors being agreed as to cause of death. The new emperor calls himself Emperor William II. and his consort Empress Victoria Augusta. Immediately after death the widow folded the silk family handkerchief around the deceased's neck. William, who sobbed audibly, placed his father's iron cross and order of merit decoration on the chest, together with a small gold chain to which was attached a number of lockets and charms, and laid his father's sword by the side of the body. When Princess Sophia, anxiously concealing her tears, went to her father's bedside, the emperor handed her a slip of paper on which was written: "Remain as noble and good as you have been in the past. This is the last wish of your dying father." In accordance with the wishes of the late emperor and of the empress, Emperor William II, has ordered that the funeral be held Monday morning. The obsequies will be devoid of pomp and will be of a military character. Owing to the limited accommodation the attendance will necessarily be very small. It is understood that a general period of mourning of six weeks will be proclaimed. All public amusements will be suspended until after the funeral. It is stated that the proclamation of Emperor William II. will refer to Germany's alliances with Austria-Hungary and Italy as guarantees that the peace of Europe will be maintained.



WILLIAM II. THE NEW EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

AMERICAN CONDOLENCES.

WASHINGTON, June 15.—Intelligence of the death of Emperor Frederick III was received by Secretary Bayard this morning by a cable message from the United States legation at Berlin. The secretary immediately informed the president, and the following telegram was sent to Berlin:

The president desires to make expression of the respectful sympathy felt throughout the United States for the German nation in the loss of their emperor, who has just yielded to death with such lofty courage and calm resignation to the Divine decree;

BAYARD.

WILL HAVE LITTLE INFLUENCE.

NEW YORK, June 15.—Oswald Ottendorfer, of the Staats Zeitung, to-day expressed himself thus:

The death of Emperor Frederick will have very little influence in European affairs. The young Emperor William, rumor says, favors a warlike policy. I cannot say whether this is true or not, but I do not look for any great change in German affairs. I think that Bismarck will take the first opportunity to show the world that the young emperor has no warlike inclinations.

The flags at the city buildings and other departments were not put at half mast when the news of Emperor Frederick was received. Mayor Hewitt said he did not feel justified in ordering them up.

RESOLVED BY THE HOUSE.

WASHINGTON, June 15. In the house Mr. McCreary of Kentucky stated that the secretary of state had received from Minister Pendleton a dispatch announcing the death of the Emperor of Germany. He would, therefore, offer the following resolution:

We have heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Emperor Frederick of Germany. He was distinguished as a soldier, having been made a field-marshal for his conspicuous services in the Austro-Prussian and Franco-Prussian wars. He was a friendly advocate of a conservative and liberal policy in Germany, and we express our respectful sympathy to the German nation in the loss of their great and renowned ruler.

Mr. McCreary asked for immediate consideration of the resolution. Mr. Smith of Wisconsin objected, but was induced to withdraw his objection. The resolution then passed.

The Farmers and Railroads.

Railroad Commissioners Austin, Becker and Gibbs and Secretary Warner met a large number of representative farmers and business men at Moorhead, Minn. The meeting was opened by a long speech by Gov. Austin, who related the history of railroad legislation in the state, and the difficulties met and the opposition of railroad managers to the enforcement of the law. He touched upon the Farmers' alliance executive committee passing resolutions condemning the commissioners when they were fighting the people's battles against the power of monopoly. He made use of the word cranks to some alliance men, etc. He stated he would soon call a meeting to give all counties in the state opportunity to be heard, also the railroads, on the question of reduction of freight rates. He advised farmers to send down able men to represent them and unfortunately referred to them as attorneys who would have to meet sharp attorneys of railroads. Mr. Probstfield, secretary of the Moorhead Farmers' alliance, resented some references made by Gov. Austin in a sharp speech, referring to a well known remark reputed to Gov. Austin that he would shake the railroads over a certain hot place, and that the farmers had been shaken over that place so long they had no money to hire attorneys, but wanted the commissioners to cope with the railroad attorneys. Messers. Wilson, Smyth, Canning, Burdick and others made speeches. The following resolutions embrace the demands of farmers:

Whereas, We find in the official report of the statistician of the department of agriculture for April, 1888, that the rate for transportation of wheat and other grain in car load lots over the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway between St. Paul, Minneapolis and Chicago, a distance of 450 miles, is 12 1-2 cents per 100 pounds; assuming this is an equitable and reasonable rate for transporting wheat 420 miles, to transport it 240 miles, the distance between Moorhead and St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth, 7.14 cents per 100 pounds would be an equal and reasonable rate. But allowing that on account of the great competition among numerous railroads between St. Paul, Minneapolis and Chicago, and the larger volume of traffic, by which they can afford to transport wheat at a lower rate than between Moorhead and St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth, we will add 40 per cent to this equal rate according to distance, which will make it a rate of 9.99 cents, or, to avoid fractions, 10 cents per 100 pounds. We deem 40 per cent in favor of the roads reaching our territory, which haul probably more wheat than any other two roads in the United States, is sufficient; therefore,

Resolved by the Moorhead alliance, that the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners of the State of Minnesota be requested to make and order the rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds in car load lots for the transportation of wheat and other grain from Moorhead, to St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth, and the same rate on flour, potatoes, lumber and hay, to take effect on or before the 15th day of August, 1888, and just and equal rates from the intermediate points to the terminal points above named.

Resolved, That we also request a proportionate reduction according to classification on the transportation of cattle, hogs, sheep, horses, coal and wood from the same date as above.

Going over Niagara Falls.

Potts and Hanlett, who distinguished themselves once by going through the perilous Niagara whirlpool rapids in a small barrel, have resolved to perform a more dangerous feat, that of going over the Niagara cataract in the little craft. They made some preliminary experiments. The barrel was launched the other day in Chippewa creek not far from the upper rapids, and towed to the center of the current which feeds the Horseshoe falls. The cask had been balasted with sand, and a bantam rooster was placed in it before the air valve was closed. Half an hour elapsed before the barrel went over the brink. In five seconds it reappeared in the boiling torrent below and rapidly drifted into Base Rock eddy, a dangerous spot, where it whirled around from noon until nearly 5 o'clock. Then it was carried toward the Maid of the Mist landing, where it was picked up by some boatmen. The ballast had shifted, and the rooster was dead and dismembered. The experience was witnessed by a large crowd of people. Mr. Potts said that either he or his partner would undoubtedly undertake to go under the falls. The ballast would be better secured, and as the ballast showed only one mark from having come in contact with a rock, he felt that the trip would be safer than many people thought.

Forty-two miles of the Manitoba road's branch from Helena to Butte are completed. There are thirty miles left and the line will probably be completed by the middle of July.

The excitement over the big disaster to Cloquet, Minn., still continues. Investigation shows that the greater part of the logs which came down there were caught. Very few of them got into Duluth harbor. The boom at Fond du Lac was broken and they came down into St. Louis bay. If the logs could be handled to advantage at Duluth, the loss would, perhaps, hardly be so great as estimated. Owners of the logs are already figuring with saw mill men there on sawing the logs at Duluth.

Shotwell, Clerihew & Lothmann, wholesale dealers in drygoods and manufacturers of clothing. Minneapolis, who have suspended, have an office in that city. Some time ago they got into a difficulty from which they were released by a loan of $150,000 which has not been repaid. Their creditors there think their liabilities will exceed $500,000, the greater part of which is due in New York.

The postoffice department is now prepared to consider the claims of postmasters who haxe suffered loss of postal funds by fire, burglary or in transit, or by unavoidable casualty since March 17, 1867. All claimants must present their claims within six months after May 9, 1888 the date of the approval of the act under which payment will be made. Blanks and all needed information will be supplied by the assistant attorney general for the postoffice department.

The Millers National Convention in session at Buffalo, New York is in favor of removing the import duty on Canadian wheat.

The marriage of Miss Mollie Garfield to J. Stanley Brown and that of Miss Belle Mason, of Cleveland, to Harry Garfield, eldest son of the dead President, took place at the home of the family. The ceremony was performed in the Garfield memorial room by Rev. W. V. W. Davis, of Worcester, Mass., the former pastor of the Euclid Avenue Presbyterian church, of Cleveland. Both the brides were members of his congregation during his pastorate in Cleveland.

A bronze equestrian statute of Israel Putman, the revolutionary hero, erected by the state, was unveiled at Brooklyn, Conn. Hon. Morris W. Seymour, of the statue commission, made the presentation, and Gov. Lounsbury the address, receiving it on behalf of the state. Prof. Johnson, of Trinity college, read a poem and Henry C. Robinson of Hartford, delivered the oration. A grandson and a great-grandson of the old hero were present, and the latter did the unveiling in the presence of a large course of people, civilian and military. A monument to the soldiers of the late war, the gift of a private citizen, was subsequently unveiled.

A Stillwater jury has given ex-Warden Reed, of the state prison, a verdict of $1,000 in a civil suit for damages against Warden Stordock for libel in giving publicity to charges of improper intimacy with female convicts against his predecessor in office. A motion for a new trial will be made, and the case will be taken to the supreme court if necessary.

REPUBLICAN COMMENT.

Behind Their Wives.

In reply to the interview in which Gov. Foraker spoke of Mr. Thurman as a copperhead during the war and one who furnished delicacies to Confederate prisoners, Mr. Thurman said that the charge does not attack him, but that it was Mrs. Thurman who distributed the delicacies to the sick in Camp Chase. Gov. Foraker, upon being shown the reply, remarked that he had nothing to say unless it would be to call attention to the fact that Judge Thurman had entered a plea of confession and avoidance, admitting the truth of the charge, but shifting the responsibility for it upon his wife. He added: "This explains to my mind what has been unexplainable to so many, why Cleveland should want Thurman on the ticket with him. They both seem to have the habit of sheltering themselves behind their wives."

Home Better Than Free Trade.

The average American citizen, outside of the professional politicians, takes very little stock in theoretical discussions in favor of free trade. Most Americans are well satisfied with the progress and prosperity of this grand Republic under its present tariff laws, and have no desire to be remodeled after the English free trade laws. The people, as a whole, fancy that the free trade which this nation enjoys with its thirty-seven states, and its 60,000,000 people, is better than any foreign trade with the paupers of Europe or the colonists of Great Britain. We should lose far more to throw open to Europe the trade of our 60,000,000 people than we should gain by competing with Europe for Africa, South American or Australian business. No other people in the world buy so many goods per capita as the inhabitants of the United States.—Boston Cultivater, (Ind.)

Republican Small Shot.

"What has the democratic party done to be proud of?"

To say that the northern soldier was a partiot and the southern soldier was a rebel is to wave the bloody shirt," so-called; at least in the eyes of modern democracy.

There is one good thing about Judge Thurman's nomination. It will educate a great many democrats into the habit of carrying a handkerchief of some sort.

The democratic theory of the campaign, as stated by Senator Gorman, is that the election "depends on the amount of money spent in the city of New York."

The drift of the democratic party under Cleveland is decidedly enough toward free trade to induce some serious thinking in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut.

It has been sixteen years since the Republicans have carried Oregon by so large a majority as they rolled up while the democratic convention was in session at St. Louis.

A Dakota Democratic paper frankly admits that Cleveland has not kept his promises, but it excuses him on the ground that "he has broken with all so sweetly." This idea, it is safe to say, did not originate with Day.

Republican Chances.

The problem before the Republicans of the country in making their Presidential nomination is comparatively simple. They are not under the necessity of watching the whole line, but can concentrate their attention upon three or four points and govern themselves accordingly. Assuming that the Pacific States will be held, the Republicans can count on 182 sure electoral votes. That leaves out New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana. It requires 201 to elect. The Republican problem is to hold the 182 and gain the 19 additional. There are three ways to do it:

I.
Sure Republican States	182
New York	36
Giving 17 to spare	218
II.
Sure Republican States	182
Indiana	15
New Jersey	9
Giving 5 more than enough	206
III.
Sure Republican States	182
Indiana	15
Connecticut	6
Giving a margin of 2	203

Republican attention, therefore, must be concentrated upon the four States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Indiana. The Democrats cannot win without New York. The Republicans can win on any one of these three combinations. Their ticket must be framed on these lines, and if framed in a way acceptable to all, so much the better. The Republican representatives will keep their eyes on these four States, and will heed their voice and votes.

Why the Nation Forgets?

Republics are ungrateful, said the philosopher; but why not? Nations have short memories. Of this fact we are to have proof this year; indeed the very existence of the Democratic party, with its practices and theories, is proof. Twenty-eight years ago good citizens knew what a debasing and dangerous thing it was to have a great political party controlled by patronage. The Democratic party could never have been dragged to ruin by Mr. Buchanan, but for the enormous power of patronage over party action. Yet the same party goes back to the same debasing methods and the same perilous thraldom as soon as it recovers power. It has no memory of its own disgraceful experience, and the sneers of enemies of Reform, with the cowardly faithlessness of its professed champions, have practically destroyed it. By what miracle comes it to pass that a great party forgets so soon its sufferings and its shame? The answer is simple. Three-fourths of its voters were not born, or were boys, when the Democratic party was dragged down to disgrace by Mr. Buchanan's patronage.

The republicans have to face the same difficulties! Every passing day takes from their ranks some of the veterans who learned what democratic government was by practical experience before the war. The boys cannot quite believe that the consequences would be serious. Timorous old age exaggerates, they fancy, and the mighty nation in its grand maturity, is now able, they hope, to face the foreign competition which may once have braved destructive to its industries. The books and the theorists tell us that free trade is best, and at all events it would do no harm to have it a little freer, and so many a young Republican half doubts whether it would seriously disturb industries if the Democrats should have their own way. For nearly four years past the country has had a Democratic President, and there are millions who forget that Republican laws have kept the tiger chained.

The need of public education is not realized by many men in actual life. They fail to remember that nations and parties forget, because experience dies with each generation. The population of the United States is now about 63,000,000. If the proportion of voters to population is what it was in 1880, about 11,600,000 votes will be cast this year. But not one-eight of the entire population, hardly one-quarter of the voting population, was of age when the civil war began. There will be 3,600,000 votes cast by men who never voted for President before, and about 5,100,000 more by men who were not of age when Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated, and only 2,900,000 by men who were then of age. The young men who cast their first vote for President will largely outnumber those who can remember what Buchanan's Administration was. Is it strange that education is needed? It is strange that the veterans who know what experience taught them before the war, and to whom a Democratic vote seems a crime against the Republic, feel that the Nation dishonors itself in going back to the practices and theories of Mr. Buchanan's Democracy? Yet, if they fail to make their experience a light to the path of young voters, the Nation may have to learn the old lesson over again in years of disaster and suffering.—N. Y. Tribune.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

Work on the new Saulspaugh hotel at Mankato was commenced. A crew of about 30 men was started in digging the foundation. In the evening Germania Band and a large number of citizens gathered at the market house and gave Mr. Saulspaugh a serenade.

The fourth annual convention of the State Pharmaceutical association met at Stillwater with some one hundred and fifty visiting druggists present. The convention was welcomed by Mayor G. M. Seymore in a happy speech. President J. P. Allen opened the proceedings with an address of more than usual interest. He stated that there were about one thousand one hundred registered pharmacists in the state, and spoke at length upon the advantages this association afforded druggists in general.

Henry Harrison, colored, was arrested at Duluth by a road detective, charged with burglarizing the depot at Barnum of $55 and a gold watch belonging to the agent. He was sent to the St. Louis county jail in default of bail. The watch was recovered.

The Southern Minnesota Fair association proposes to have a wedding during its next fair, to be held September 3 to 8. It solicits applications from candidates for matrimonial happiness to be made to the secretary, C. Van Campen, Rochester, Minn. The first bona fide application will be the one accepted, the names of the contracting parties to be kept secret until the hour of the wedding.

The trustees of the Albert Lea Lutheran high school have resolved to put up a building to cost about $15,000.

Mr. Anderson, a stone-cutter, was assaulted and robbed on Mississippi bridge at St. Cloud. One of the assailants choked him, while the other held him and went through his pockets. Elmer Stevenson and John Dennison were arrested on suspicion.

A two-year-old child of Henry Gardner, a farmer residing nortwest of Dodge Centre, was scalded to death by backing into a pail of hot water.

The St Louis river is booming, and old settlers say they never saw it as high. About fifty feet of the bridge at Thomson was washed away. At Cloquet the people living on the Island have been obliged to move, and the mills are flooded. Great fears are entertained for the safety of twenty million feet of logs. They will surely go if the water continues to rise.

The vicinity of Perham, in Otter Tail county is thickly flooded with grasshoppers. Prof. Toghan, acting according to the instructions of Gov. McGill, has been investigating the matter, and numerous barrels of tar and a quantity of sheet iron were sent to the relief of the farmers in that county.

The Red Lake river is still on the rampage. All of the dray teams have been kept on the go moving families that live in the lower part of Crookston. The boom at the cut-off, three miles above, gave way, and now the boom in the city is holding a log jam that extends for miles up the river. If this should give way it would take the three iron bridges in the city, and do a great deal of damage to other property. The mill men think the boom will hold. Old settlers say it is the highest water since 1877.

The examination of Michael McFarland closed at Waseca, and he was released. Whisky and the cold benumbed and stupified the old man Donigan so that when he got out of the wagon he fell into the pool of water and was drowned before McFarland, who was also drunk, could render assistance.

There is considerable music in the air at Blue Earth City caused by the action of the village for violation of the liquor laws. These are for various offenses, including illegal sales, drunkenness and disorderly conduct, extending back for a month, and which have been "spotted" by a local "gentleman" hired for the purpose.

The old settlers had their annual meeting and picnic at Balls Bluff on Lake Shetek, near Currie. Notwithstanding the unfavorable weather there was the largest attendence of old settlers ever had. An old-fashioned pioneer dinner was served.

A little boy eight years old, son of John Micha, living 28 miles from Hutchinson, started for a friend's house on the 6th inst. On his return he must have become bewildered and lost, as he has not been since seen. A searching party has scoured the woods, but no trace of him can be found.

Joseph Hartman, commonly known by the name of "Havier," was found dead in the woods near the Zettel farm in Eagle Creek, Scott county. He was an old soldier having served from May, 1861, until October, 1865, in Company I, Eighth Illinois infantry Volunteers. He was often urged to enter the soldiers' home, but always refused on the supposition that it was on a parr with entering "states prison."

Burglars entered the house of Charles Horton, the lumberman, at Winona, but were scared away without any booty, after piling up a quantity of silverware and other plunder.

A tornado struck the town of Barnesville, Minn., wrecking outhouses and small buildings, tearing up sidewalks and smashing things generally. It was the hardest storm in the history of the town. Half built and small buildings were blown down or moved out of shape. The rain was pouring down in torrents. The damage is about $5,000.

A man named Glasgo shot and killed his son-in-law, named Lamade, and then put a bullet through his own head at Glasgow, Pa. The son-in-law died instantly. Glasgo still lives, but will die. The cause of the tragedy is attributed to family troubles.

Mr. Boutwell of Kasota, Minn., invited several of his friends to an entertainment at his house, at which they ate some cheese purchased in the village. In one hour several men were taken sick, vomiting violently, several children having such spasms that their lives were in danger. Dr. Collins of St Peter was summoned, and did all he could to relieve their sufferings. Nineteen persons were sick at one time from eating the cheese, but have all passed the line of danger. The cheese is supposed to be adulterated with neuter oil, and was made in Wisconsin.

FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

SENATE.

A message from the president was presented returning, without his approval, a pension bill, on the ground that the beneficiary had received no injury in the army. Referred to the committee on pensions. Also another message returning without approval, a bill relieving a government contractor for hay of an indebtedness of $1,042, incurred by a non-fulfilment of the contract. Referred to the committee on military affairs.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill, and was addressed by Mr. Dolph on the subject of coast defenses.

The bill went over without action, and the District of Columbia appropriation bill was taken up. It also went over without action, and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE.

Mr. Taulbee, of Kentucky, called up, as the regular order of business, the resolution reported from the committee on postoffices calling on the postmaster general for a tabulated statement of disallowed postmaster's claims presented from the State of Kentucky under the act of March 3, 1883. The report on the resolution is an adverse one, and the recommendation is that it lie on the table.

The House then went into the committee of the whole (Mr Springer, of Illinois, in the chair) on the Tarriff bill.

Mr. Bynum, of Indiana, moved to strike from the free list, flax, hackled, which was agreed to. The discussion occupied the rest of the day.

SENATE.

In the senate Mr. Hale called up Mr. Morgan's resolution as to the fishery treaty, and made a speech upon it. The senate then resumed consideration on the resolution offered by Mr. Stewart calling for a statement of the tale of bonds since April 1, 1888.

HOUSE.

Mr. Lind made a strong five minutes speech in favor of the admission duty free of machinery to be used in the manufacture of binding twine. The Mills bill allows the admission of material and machinery for the manufacture of cotton bagging for cotton and for the manufacture of jute sacks, such as is used on the Pacific coast for bagging wheat, duty free. Mr. Lind argued that it was a matter of simple justice that the privileges thus secured to the Southern and West coast farmers should be extended to the Northwestern farmers.

SENATE.

The agricultural department appropriation bill passed. Among the amendments agreed to was one appropriating $100,000 for the continuance of experiments in making sorghum sugar.

HOUSE.

During the consideration of the tariff bill, an amendment by Mr. Buchanan of New Jersey to strike out the words "admitting free of duty plates coated with a mixture of lead and tin," was rejected; as was one offered by Mr. Dalzell of Pennsylvania, to strike out the entire tin plate paragraph. Mr. Weber of New York moved to strike glue and gelatine from the free list, thus forestalling the committee amendment to the same purpose. This prevailed without division.

The Republicans have determined to force the Democrats to lay aside the tariff bill during the coming week, when so many of their leaders will be at Chicago. During the St. Louis convention the Republican side was very conservative, but their courtesy has not been returned. Accordingly, with a view of forcing some amicable arrangement for a truce, Mr. Adams of Chicago objected to the appointment of conferees on the diplomatic consular bill, and similar objection will be persisted in until an arrangement is reached.

SENATE.

The senate amendments to the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee river near Knoxville were concurred in, and the bill was passed. A motion to consider the army appropriation bill was defeated. Consideration of bills on the calender followed. Several hours debate ensued on several bills, but they were finally laid aside. Bills granting relief to Ellen P. Malloy and the heirs of John H. Newman were passed.

HOUSE.

The house went into committee of the whole to consider the army appropriation bill. An amendment was adopted appropriating $300,000 for beginning the construction of a new military post near Chicago, Ill. An amendment appropriating $30,000 for the purchase of powder to fire morning and evening guns at military posts was adopted. A provision was added to the paragraph relating to post supplies, requiring them to be purchased where they can be purchased cheapest, quality and cost of transportation considered. The committee then rose and the bill passed.

Chinese Customs.

The Chinese, topographically our antipodes, are as opposite to us in manners and customs.

Our night is their day. Our morning color is black, theirs is white. Their boats are drawn by men, their carriages are moved by means of sails.

Old men fly kites, while little boys look on; with them the seats of honor is at the left hand, and to keep one's hat on is a sign of respect. We drink tea hot and wine cold; they drink wine hot and tea cold.

The family name comes first instead of last; thus, John Smith would be Smith John. The needle of their compass points to the south, ours to the north. They say "westnorth" instead of "northwest," "eastsouth" instead of "southeast." Their soldiers wear quilted petticoats, satin boots and bead necklaces, carry umbrellas and fans, and go to a night attack with lanterns, being more afraid of the dark than of the enemy.

A married woman when young and pretty is a slave; when she is old and withered she is the most respected and beloved member of the family.

Their most valued piece of furniture is a handsome camphor-wood coffin, which they keep in the best room. They are very fond of fireworks, but always display them in the daytime. If you offend a Chinaman, instead of killing you he will kill himself on your doorstep.

Steep Hills.

"What have you been doing lately?" asked a traveling man of a former associate in the same business whom he met in a Pennsylvania village.

"I've been having pretty hard luck."

"In what way?"

"You see my uncle died and left me a farm out here in the mountains and I gave up traveling in order to come out here and run it."

"Don't you like it?"

"No; I can't say I do. I can stand a good deal, but I do draw the line at farming where the hills are so dog-goned steep that the cattle have to stand on their hind legs to nibble the grass off them.—Merchant Traveler.

Judge Searle of St. Cloud, Minn., sentenced E. Stevens and John Dennison to ten years at hard labor, and Sheriff Hammerel and his deputies took them to Stillwater at once. Stevens and Dennison were accused of attacking a Swede stonecutter only one week before on the Mississippi river wagon bridge. They knocked him down and robbed him.

SHOT HIMSELF.

Ex-Warden Reed Astonished his Friends by Putting a Bullet in His Head.

Every body was surprised and shocked at the suicide of ex-Warden J. A. Reed, who has resided at Minneapolis since his retirement as warden of the State prison. For several days Capt. Reed and wife have been absent at Stillwater attending the damage suit against Warden Stordock. During their absence Capt. Reed had purchased a hotel at White Bear Lake, with the intention of conducting it this season. On Friday evening Mrs. Reed and son and daughter went to White Bear to examine the property, while her husband remained at Stillwater.

During the absence of the parents the home had been in charge of his eldest daughter, Miss Lou Reed, and a little sister between five and six years of age. After Capt. Reed's arrival home on Saturday he conversed for some time with his daughter in regard to the purchase of the hotel and his plans for conducting it. He had previously made arrangements for the removal of household effects to White Bear, and shipped a portion of them. He was perfectly rational and in his usual spirits. There was nothing in his conversation or conduct to create the slightest suspicion of discouragement, and he evidently entertained a hopeful view of the new enterprise at White Bear, or Mahtomedi, where the hotel is located. About 9 o'clock Capt. Reed complained of weariness and informed his daughter that he intended to take a bath and then lie down for a time to obtain needed rest. He went to his room, and a few minutes later Miss Reed joined him and handed him a glass of lemonade which she had prepared. He drank the lemonade and the daughter sat down near by and fanned him until he fell asleep. She then left him and resumed her household duties.

Captain Reed was found to be unconscious, and the character of the wound was such as to render recovery improbable. Being left-handed, Capt. Reed had apparently fired at his left temple, but in pulling the trigger the muzzle of the pistol was thrown downward slightly, deflecting the course of the Bullet. It entered the left cheek, and passing through the head near the throat passed out of the right ear and fell on the floor.

The general opinion prevails among those best acquainted with the man and his affairs that long standing ill health, aggravated by the hot weather, and the excitement attendant upon the recent trial at Stillwater, produced temporary insanity, during which the deed was done. All know that at one time the charge made concerning his official record were a great source of annoyance and worry to him, but in the face of the fact that the investigating committee vindicated him and a jury has just given him $1,000 damages for libel, the suit being based on those charges, it seems unreasonable to suppose that it was this affair that led to the shooting.

Mrs. Reed has been in almost as great need of medical care as her husband. The news of the shooting seemed to benumb her faculties at first, but when she first entered the house she swooned away, and upon reviving, became delirious. She could not be convinced her husband was not already dead and her suffering was very pitiable. She had become somewhat better and was taken to the sick room, where the sight of her husband still living had a beneficial effect upon her, and the physicians at once busied her in caring for him, which is rapidly tranquilizing her mind. The captain is perfectly rational and talked of his condition, though no questions were asked him. It is very certain now, that when he entered the house, he was suffering from the effects of a light sunstroke. He had the one idea of cooling his head, and for that purpose had gone to the bath room. While in the wandering mental condition he evidently shot himself without knowing what he was doing. He has now no recollection whatever of having shot himself, and thinks it was entirely an accident.

RAILROAD TRAIN ROBBERY.

A Gang of Eight Road Agents Go Through a Northern Pacific Train.

For the first time in the history of Montana Territory, a railroad train was stopped by highwaymen, the express messenger and the passengers compelled to yield up their cash. When the westbound train on the Northern Pacific was in the vicinity of Junction City, a station about sixty miles east of Billings, the engineer noticed a bright light ahead being waved to and fro. Knowing there had been a heavy storm the day before and fearing a bridge was gone he slowed up. Scarcely had the train stopped before a masked man appeared at the steps of the engine, and an instant later three shots were fired in rapid succession, one cutting its way through the cab and the others striking the drive wheel. With a gun leveled at his head, the engineer, T. H. Sargent, was commanded to throw up his hands, which he did instantly. The fireman, W. B. Cavender, was treated likewise. Sargent was ordered out of his cab and under an armed escort of four men taken to the express car, the door of which was broken in with the engineer's pick. Sargent was then ordered to crawl through the opening and after telling the messenger what was going on, did so. Ordered to throw up his hands, the messenger at first refused, but the click of a gun instantly made him yield. The thieves remained in the express car about one hour and rifled everything, securing about $400. Meantime the conductor and other employes had been under guard, and when through with the express matter two highwaymen were stationed on the Pullman platform, and the conductor, a gun at his head, was compelled to lead the way through the car, followed by two men, who compelled every male passenger to throw up his hands. One of the robbers intimidated the passengers while the others rifled their pockets. No jewelery or papers were taken, only cash being wanted. The entire train was gone through in the same systematic manner, no effort being made to molest the ladies. While the robbers were in the express car the passengers secreted valuables and big money under the seats and other places, so the haul only amounted to about $1,000. One passenger, named Williams had about $15,000 the proceeds of a cattle sale, which he secreted in a lunch basket. But one of the victims resisted and a bullet hole through his hat quickly brought him to terms. The gang consisted of eight men wearing black masks and having the appearance of cowboys. A constant fusilade of shots w's kept up. On the arrival of the train at Billings Sheriff Harris of Yellowstone county was notified and with a large posse se started in pursuit. The country is level, and, as many of the posse are old Indian scouts, it is beleived the gang will be run down.

Telegraphic Brevities.

Reports of damage by wind and lightning and death of stock continue to come in to Aberdeen from neighboring counties. The course of the storm seems to have been southwest from the Missouri river. The electrical features were most marked in regions sparsely settled and where there is the largest amount of uncultivated land. Two illustrations of this facted are noted. Between Westport and Leola lightning came down the chimney of a house occupied by a man named Swartz, and mangled the foot of a young man named Lebold so that amputation was necessary. The toes of the foot were slit as by a knife, and the ball of the foot torn in a manner resembling a gunshot wound. A yoke of oxen were killed in a field in the same neighborhood. The region is but little cultivated.

A collision occurred on Lake Michigan between the schooner Willie Keller and the steamer Robert Mills in which the former was sent to the bottom. It occurred in the midst of a heavy fog, between the Big and Little Au Sable islands. The schooner is a three-master, and was loaded with 17,000 bushels of corn, which will prove a total loss. The crew made its escape.

The upper Mississippi river is on a rampage. All the low lands from the rapids are covered from three to five feet with water. The settlers have had to vacate their homes. Some families were living on rafts when picked up by the steamboat. Higher water is expected, as the last rise at the rapids has not reached Aitkin yet, and large quantities of water are coming out of the Swan river.

Congressman Lind of Minnesota introduced in the house a bill for the deposit of the agricultural lands embraced within the limits of the Red Pipe Stone reservation, which directs the secretary of the interior to appoint a commission of three persons who are residents of Minnesota to appraise the actual value of said lands and improvements thereon. Any person who has hitherto resided on and made improvements on any of these lands, but was compelled by the military authorities to abandon the same shall be entitled to the prior right for six months after the filing of the report of the commissioners, to enter and purchase lands not exceeding 160 acres at the price appraised by the commissioners.

Attorney A. S. Cole, a deacon of the Presbyterian Church of Nebraska City was arrested while returning from church on the charge of embezzling. The information was filed by the clerk of the district court. Cole had given the clerk his note some time ago in connection with a suit, and was to leave for the West. The matter was settled very satisfactorily by the clerk. Cole earned an unenviable notoriety during the Capt. Howgate excitement by assisting Howgate to make his escape.

Anthony W. Robinson, agent for the Bankers Mutual Relief Association of Aberdeen, Dak., was found dead in a field near Ashby, Minn. He had been on a protracted spree that with the intense heat of the day caused his death. His mother and son reside in Richland Center, Wis. Among the papers found on his person was an unpaid pension certificate and his discharge from the army. He was a member of the 36th Wisconsin. He had no money and was buried by the county.

Mrs. Emery A. Storrs, widow of the celebrated orator and lawyer, is lying fatally ill at the home of W. J. Guest, her late husband's stenographer at Chicago. She was stricken with paralysis while visiting at Mr. Guest's house, and the physicians in attendance state that death will ensue within twenty-four hours. The husband also died from paralysis.

The Washington Post gives publicity to another anonymous attack on Judge Fuller signed simply "A Union Man." The writer states that Mr. Fuller's confirmation is held up because in the Illinois legislature in 1863 he voted for a resolution denouncing the emancipation proclamation; he supported a resolution that no amendment should ever be made to the constitutution to abolish or interfere with with any state with the domestic institution thereof, voted against the bill to extend the right of suffrage to the volunteer soldiers of Illinois and never had such a a place at the bar as would justify his appointment to the position of chief justice of the United States.

At St. Paul the other night a pistol shot was heard in Lafayette park. A police officer rushed to the scene, and on searching the grounds found a man, apparently about sixty-five years of age, with head bent down, sitting on one of the park benches. At his side was a 32-caliber revolver, one barrel of which was discharged. His clothes were examined and letters found which proved his name to be George Hartman, was running a saloon in St. Paul. What his motive was in committing the rash act is not yet known.

Auditor Ward of Dakota has served notice on the Northwestern Mutual Insurance Company of Wahpeton that it must cease doing business in the territory, as the report of the public examiner shows it to be insolvent.

The Prohibitionists of the Forty-second legislative district met at Morris, Minn., in mass convention. There were forty persons present. After discussion as to whether or not the voters of the two old parties were equally guilty with the saloon keepers, a compromise was effected on the word jointly. Then they nominated J. O. Barret of Brown's Valley for representative. Those present from Stevens county made the following nominations: Auditor J. J. Pimm; treasurer, H. Whiteley; probate judge, W. H. Miles; clerk of court; A. Young; superintendent of schools, Rev. Smith.

Archie McDonald, a farmer of Straith clair, Manitoba, was found hanging by the neck in his house dead. He evidently committed suicide.

John Bowans, colored was taken from the jail at Union Bridge, Ind., by a band of ten or fifteen colored men, all masked, and carried to the outskirts of town where he was strung up by the neck to the limb of a large oak tree. He motioned to be let down, and the rope was slackened so that he could speak. He made use of the opportunity, and slipping through the rope was away like a shot. The lynchers gave chase and fired several shots after him, but without effect. He has not yet been recaptured. Bowans in a fit of jealousy attacked with a razor another colored man and a girl with whom he was walking.

Information from Stevens county, Kansas, the scene of the railroad and county seat fight, between the town of Hugoton and Woodsdale, is to the effect that the entire population is under arms. The situation is serious and farmers are riding around armed instead of tilling the soil, and all crops are likely to fail consequently. Gov. Martin has commanded the militia to be in readiness for marching orders at any time. It is hoped that the mandate issued by the supreme court ordering the commissioners of Stevens county to re-canvass the vote polled at the recent railroad bond election, will have the effect of quieting matters

A collision occurred on the Pennsylvania road in Philadelphia, by which 20 freight cars were wrecked. One car was loaded with refined oil, which caught fire from a hot box, and the cars were almost entirely destroyed with the greater part of their contents. Estimated loss, $5,000, on which there is no insurance. No one was injured.

A diver named Joe Anderson, of Detroit, while searching for a wreck at Point au Frames discovered a heavy box in deep water, which upon examination was found to be sunk with heavy weights attached to the box with chains. He returned to the village and after procuring assistance managed to raise the box, when to the horror of all it was discovered to contain the remains of an apparently young woman, doubled up and forced into the box. She was well dressed. Whether a dark deed has been committed or not is it hard to say, but there were no indications of an ordinary burial.

A marriage which favored very strongly of the Nina Van Zandt-Spies episode, with the proxy arrangement left out, took place in the county jail at St. Cloud. Mary Esther Gouro, of Verndale, and Arthur Makepiece, who is sentenced to ten years in state prison for forgery, were married by Justice H. G. Wire. The bride, who is rather a handsome woman came to St. Cloud soon after Makepiece's incarceration sometime ago, and secured a position as diningroom girl in the Grand Central hotel under the name of Beulah Dewell, and after her marriage resumed her position in the hotel.

Edward F. Stokes got into a row with a young broker named Trumbridge, near the Hoffman House in New York. Stokes grabbed the other fellow by the nose, and in less time than it takes to relate it several hundred lawyers, brokers and men-about-town were congregated on the sidewalk. Just when it was most exciting a truckman elbowed his way through the crowd and parted the combatants. As soon as Mr. Stokes' fingers were forced apart a great stream of dark blood poured from the nostrils of the little broker.

Chamber's Journal.

As we walked along through the jungle I failed to keep up with the other members of the party, who had got on some distance ahead, when suddenly I heard a rustle in the under wood, and almost at the same moment an enormous tiger presented himself and prepared to spring upon me. I had never seen a more magnificent beast, and I could not help admiring him, notwithstanding the danger of my position. But there was no time to be lost. I immediately presented my rifle and fired. As ill-luck would have it, neither shot struck; and in another second the tiger was on me and had thrown me down, his claws buried in my left shoulder. I had no particuare sensation of fear, and I remember thinking quite calmly, as I lay on the ground, the tiger's hot breath coming against my face, "It's all up with me now." But at that moment my faithful little Mungo came to the rescue he bit the tiger's tail so severely, that the beast immediately released his hold and turned round to seize its new adversary. But Mungo, as sharp and wary as he was plucky, was off in the tall grass in an instant. The tiger followed; but the dog had the advantage over him, as it could run through the grass and under the brushwood at a pace which the other could not keep up with. In fact it was almost comical to see how the great creature bounded about in its useless chase after the dog. But I knew that the tiger, disappointed of seizing Mungo, would soon be back again to attack his master; so I reloaded my gun and stood awaiting his return. In a short time he was before me once more; and again I levelled my gun as well as I could, considering the pain in my left shoulder. The first shot missed; but the second struck the tiger in the shoulder, crippled him, and made him roll about in agony. Reloading as rapidly as possible, I went nearer to him, aimed very deliberately, and this time gave him his quietus. Scarcely had I done so before Mungo came bounding up to me, looking into my face, and whining as if with joy at seeing me safe.

Bitten by a Cobra and Lives.

London Standard.

Dr. Vincent Richards has been granted an experience unique, probably in the annals of mankind—fairly bitten by a cobra, he has felt no consequences. At this moment, doubtless, he regrets the natural irritation which led him to kill the reptile. We may safely assume that its fangs were in working order; but it would have been more satisfactory to have had clear proof. Dr. Richards collected a number of snakes for some experiment—in these cases one can never be sure what class of experiment will turn up, however. A lively cobra upset the program, fastening upon the operator's hand. He laid the finger open to the bone, above the wound, and applied permanganate of potash—gentlemen of prudent disposition who consort with snakes keep such materials handy. Then he drove off for advice. Dr. Macleod and Sir Benjamin Simpson re-opened the gash, cauterized it with nitric acid, and the story ends. More than two months have passed, and Dr. Richards may pose, if he thinks fit, as the hero of an adventure hitherto unparalleled. It is a great pity, though, that he destroyed the snake. Perhaps the remains gave sufficient evidence of its capacity for mischief; but if so, the report should have mentioned it. We should like to know, also, how much time was wasted in the impulse of indignation—but that will never be ascertained. For all his presence of mind, Dr. Richards did not consult a stop watch, probably, in fact, if he had, the story would have been yet shorter than it is. In treating the bite of a cobra a man must work against time at awful odds, for one pulse beat which carries the poison into the system carries death—at least such is the impression of the authorities, and this case will be immensely valuable if it show good reason to think that the idea is exaggerated.

During a storm at Chatfield, Minn., lightning struck the house of Berlet Gunderson, four miles south of that place and killed two children.

A. P. Clarkson, a farmer laborer was murdered by John Lowry at West Point Illinois. When four rods distant Lowry discharged a double-barrel shotgun. The murderer then advanced within eight feet of his victim and fired again, the charge taking effect in the neck. Shortly after Lowry's wife was found dead in the house and is supposed to have been murdered by her jealous husband. Clark had been accused by Lowry of sustaining illicit relations with his wife. The murderer has escaped and officers are in pursuit.

Can a Man Swallow a Cannon-ball?

Well, "that depends." He can if his throat is large enough and the cannon-ball not too large. The question really seems worthy of some consideration in view of the size of some of the pills that are prescribed for suffering humanity. Why not throw them "to the dogs" and take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets? Small sugar-coated, purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, in glass, and always fresh.

A Good Appetite

FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

Abstract of the Proceedings of the Senate and House.

SENATE.

A message from the president was presented returning, without his approval, a pension bill, on the ground that the beneficiary had received no injury in the army. Referred to the committee on pensions. Also another message returning without approval, a bill relieving a government contractor for hay of an indebte:iness of $1,042, incurred by a non-fulfilment of the contract. Referred to the committee on military affairs.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill, and was addressed by Mr. Dolph on the subject of coast defenses.

The bill went over without action, and the District of Columbia appropriation bill was taken up. It also went over without action, and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE.

Mr. Taulbee, of Kentucky, called up, as the regular order of business, the resolution reported from the committee on postoffices calling on the postmaster general for a tabulated statement of disallowed postmaster's claims presented from the State of Kentucky under the act of March 3, 1883. The report on the resolution is an adverse one, and the recommendation is that it lie on the table.

The House then went into the committee of the whole (Mr Springer, of Illinois, in the chair) on the Tarriff bill.

Mr. Bynum, of Indiana, moved to strike from the free list, flax, hackled, which was agreed to. The discussion occupied the rest of the day.

SENATE.

In the senate Mr. Hale called up Mr. Morgan's resolution as to the fishery treaty, and made a speech upon it. The senate then resumed consideration on the resolution offered by Mr. Stewart calling for a statement of the tale of bonds since April 1, 1888.

HOUSE.

Mr. Lind made a strong five minutes speech in favor of the admission duty free of machinery to be used in the manufacture of binding twine. The Mills bill allows the admission of material and machinery for the manufacture of cotton bagging for cotton and for the manufacture of jute sacks, such as is used on the Pacific coast for bagging wheat, duty free. Mr. Lind argued that it was a matter of simple justice that the privileges thus secured to the Southern and West coast farmers should be extended to the Northwestern farmers.

SENATE.

The agricultural department appropriation bill passed. Among the amendments agreed to was one appropriating $100,000 for the continuance of experiments in making sorghum sugar.

HOUSE.

During the consideration of the tariff bill, an amendment by Mr. Buchanan of New Jersey to strike out the words "admitting free of duty plates coated with a mixture of lead and tin," was rejected; as was one offered by Mr. Dalzell of Pennsylvania, to strike out the entire tin plate paragraph. Mr. Weber of New York moved to strike glue and gelatine from the free list, thus forestalling the committee amendment to the same purpose. This prevailed without division.

The Republicans have determined to force the Democrats to lay aside the tariff bill during the coming week, when so many of their leaders will be at Chicago. During the St. Louis convention the Republican side was very conservative, but their courtesy has not been returned. Accordingly, with a view of forcing some amicable arrangement for a truce, Mr. Adams of Chicago objected to the appointment of conferees on the diplomatic consular bill, and similar objection will be persisted in until an arrangement is reached.

SENATE.

The senate amendments to the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee river near Knoxville were concurred in, and the bill was passed. A motion to consider the army appropriation bill was defeated. Consideration of bills on the calender followed. Several hours debate ensued on several bills, but they were finally laid aside. Bills granting relief to Ellen P. Malloy and the heirs of John H. Newman were passed.

HOUSE.

The house went into committee of the whole to consider the army appropriation bill. An amendment was adopted appropriating $300,000 for beginning the construction of a new military post near Chicago, Ill. An amendment appropriating $80,000 for the purchase of powder to fire morning and evening guns at military posts was adopted. A provision was added to the paragraph relating to post supplies, requiring them to be purchased where they can be purchased cheapest, quality and cost of transportation considered. The committee then rose and the bill passed.

Chinese Customs.

The Chinese, topographically our antipodes, are as opposite to us in manners and customs.

Our night is their day. Our morning color is black, theirs is white. Their boats are drawn by men, their carriages are moved by means of sails.

Old men fly kites, while little boys look on; with them the seats of honor is at the left hand, and to keep one's hat on is a sign of respect. We drink tea hot and wine cold; they drink wine hot and tea cold.

The family name comes first instead of last; thus, John Smith would be Smith John. The needle of their compass points to the south, ours to the north. They say "westnorth" instead of "northwest," "eastsouth" instead of "southeast." Their soldiers wear quilted petticoats, satin boots and bead necklaces, carry umbrellas and fans, and go to a night attack with lanterns, being more afraid of the dark than of the enemy.

A married woman when young and pretty is a slave; when she is old and withered she is the most respected and beloved member of the family.

Their most valued piece of furniture is a handsome camphor-wood coffin, which they keep in the best room. They are very fond of fireworks, but always display them in the daytime. If you offend a Chinaman, instead of killing you he will kill himself on your doorstep.

Steep Hills.

"What have you been doing lately?" asked a traveling man of a former associate in the same business whom he met in a Pennsylvania village.

"I've been having pretty hard luck."

"In what way?"

"You see my uncle died and left me a farm out here in the mountains and I gave up traveling in order to come out here and run it."

"Don't you like it?"

"No; I can't say I do. I can stand a good deal, but I do draw the line at farming where the hills are so doggoned steep that the cattle have to stand on their hind legs to nibble the grass off them.—Merchant Traveler.

Judge Searle of St. Cloud, Minn., sentenced E. Stevens and John Dennison to ten years at hard labor, and Sheriff Hammerel and his deputies took them to Stillwater at once. Stevens and Dennison were accused of attacking a Swede stonecutter only one week before on the Mississippi river wagon bridge. They knocked him down and robbed him.

SHOT HIMSELF.

Ex-Warden Reed Astonished his Friends by Putting a Bullet in His Head.

Every body was surprised and shocked at the suicide of ex-Warden J. A. Reed, who has resided at Minneapolis since his retirement as warden of the State prison. For several days Capt. Reed and wife have been absent at Stillwater attending the damage suit against Warden Stordock. During their absence Capt. Reed had purchased a hotel at White Bear Lake, with the intention of conducting it this season. On Friday evening Mrs. Reed and son and daughter went to White Bear to examine the property, while her husband remained at Stillwater.

During the absence of the parents the home had been in charge of his eldest daughter, Miss Lou Reed, and a little sister between five and six years of age. After Capt. Reed's arrival home on Saturday he conversed for some time with his daughter in regard to the purchase of the hotel and his plans for conducting it. He had previously made arrangements for the removal of household effects to White Bear, and shipped a portion of them. He was perfectly rational and in his usual spirits. There was nothing in his conversation or conduct to create the slightest suspicion of discouragement, and he evidently entertained a hopeful view of the new enterprise at White Bear, or Mahtomedi, where the hotel is located. About 9 o'clock Capt. Reed complained of weariness and informed his daughter that he intended to take a bath and then lie down for a time to obtain needed rest. He went to his room, and a few minutes later Miss Reed joined him and handed him a glass of lemonade which she had prepared. He drank the lemonade and the daughter sat down near by and fanned him until he fell asleep. She then left him and resumed her household duties.

Captain Reed was found to be unconscious, and the character of the wound was such as to render recovery improbable. Being left-handed, Capt. Reed had apparently fired at his left temple, but in pulling the trigger the muzzle of the pistol was thrown downward slightly, deflecting the course of the Bullet. It entered the left cheek, and passing through the head near the throat passed out of the right ear and fell on the floor.

The general opinion prevails among those best acquainted with the man and his affairs that long standing ill health, aggravated by the hot weather, and the excitement attendant upon the recent trial at Stillwater, produced temporary insanity, during which the deed was done. All know that at one time the charge made concerning his official record were a great source of annoyance and worry to him, but in the face of the fact that the investigating committee vindicated him and a jury has just given him $1,000 damages for libel, the suit being based on those charges, it seems unreasonable to suppose that it was this affair that led to the shooting.

Mrs. Reed has been in almost as great need of medical care as her husband. The news of the shooting seemed to benumb her faculties at first, but when she first entered the house she swooned away, and upon reviving, became delirious. She could not be convinced her husband was not already dead and her suffering was very pitiable. She had become somewhat better and was taken to the sick room, where the sight of her husband still living had a beneficial effect upon her, and the physicians at once busied her in caring for him, which is rapidly tranquilizing her mind. The captain is perfectly rational and talked of his condition, though no questions were asked him. It is very certain now, that when he entered the house, he was suffering from the effects of a light sunstroke. He had the one idea of cooling his head, and for that purpose had gone to the bath room. While in the wandering mental condition he evidently shot himself without knowing what he was doing. He has now no recollection whatever of having shot himself, and thinks it was entirely an accident.

RAILROAD TRAIN ROBBERY.

A Gang of Eight Road Agents Go Through a Northern Pacific Train.

For the first time in the history of Montana Territory, a railroad train was stopped by highwaymen, the express messenger and the passengers compelled to yield up their cash. When the westbound train on the Northern Pacific was in the vicinity of Junction City, a station about sixty miles east of Billings, the engineer noticed a bright light ahead being waved to and fro. Knowing there had been a heavy storm the day before and fearing a bridge was gone he slowed up. Scarcely had the train stopped before a masked man appeared at the steps of the engine, and an instant later three shots were fired in rapid succession, one cutting its way through the cab and the others striking the drive wheel. With a gun leveled at his head, the engineer, T. H. Sargent, was commanded to throw up his hands, which he did instantly. The fireman, W. B. Cavender, was treated likewise. Sargent was ordered out of his cab and under an armed escort of four men taken to the express car, the door of which was broken in with the engineer's pick. Sargent was then ordered to crawl through the opening and after telling the messenger what was going on, did so. Ordered to throw up his hands, the messenger at first refused, but the click of a gun instantly made him yield. The thieves remained in the express car about one hour and rifled everything, securing about $400. Meantime the conductor and other employes had been under guard, and when through with the express matter two highwaymen were stationed on the Pullman platform, and the conductor, a gun at his head, was compelled to lead the way through the car, followed by two men, who compelled every male passenger to throw up his hands. One of the robbers intimidated the passengers while the others rifled their pockets. No jewelery or papers were taken, only cash being wanted. The entire train was gone through in the same systematic manner, no effort being made to molest the ladies. While the robbers were in the express car the passengers secreted valuables and big money under the seats and other places, so the haul only amounted to about $1,000. One passenger, named Williams had about $15,000 the proceeds of a cattle sale, which he secreted in a lunch basket. But one of the victims resisted and a bullet hole through his hat quickly brought him to terms. The gang consisted of eight men wearing black masks and having the appearance of cowboys. A constant fusilade of shots was kept up. On the arrival of the train at Billings Sheriff Harris of Yellowstone county was notified and with a large posse se started in pursuit. The country is level, and, as many of the posse are old Indian scouts, it is beleived the gang will be run down.

Telegraphic Brevities.

Reports of damage by wind and lightning and death of stock continue to come in to Aberdeen from neighboring counties. The course of the storm seems to have been southwest from the Missouri river. The electrical features were most marked in regions sparsely settled and where there is the largest amount of uncultivated land. Two illustrations of this facted are noted. Between Westport and Leola lightning came down the chimney of a house occupied by a man named Swartz, and mangled the foot of a young man named Lebold so that amputation was necessary. The toes of the foot were slit as by a knife, and the ball of the foot torn in a manner resembling a gunshot wound. A yoke of oxen were killed in a field in the same neighborhood. The region is but little cultivated.

A collision occurred on Lake Michigan between the schooner Willie Keller and the steamer Robert Mills in which the former was sent to the bottom. It occurred in the midst of a heavy fog, between the Big and Little Au Sable islands. The schooner is a three-master, and was loaded with 17,000 bushels of corn, which will prove a total loss. The crew made its escape.

The upper Mississippi river is on a rampage. All the low lands from the rapids are covered from three to five feet with water. The settlers have had to vacate their homes. Some families were living on rafts when picked up by the steamboat. Higher water is expected, as the last rise at the rapids has not reached Aitkin yet, and large quantities of water are coming out of the Swan river.

Congressman Lind of Minnesota introduced in the house a bill for the deposit of the agricultural lands embraced within the limits of the Red Pipe Stone reservation, which directs the secretary of the interior to appoint a commission of three persons who are residents of Minnesota to appraise the actual value of said lands and improvements thereon. Any person who has hitherto resided on and made improvements on any of these lands, but was compelled by the military authorities to abandon the same shall be entitled to the prior right for six months after the filing of the report of the commissioners, to enter and purchase lands not exceeding 160 acres at the price appraised by the commissioners.

Attorney A. S. Cole, a deacon of the Presbyterian Church of Nebraska City was arrested while returning from church on the charge of embezzling. The information was filed by the clerk of the district court. Cole had given the clerk his note some time ago in connection with a suit, and was to leave for the West. The matter was settled very satisfactorily by the clerk. Cole earned an unenviable notoriety during the Capt. Howgate excitement by assisting Howgate to make his escape.

Anthony W. Robinson, agent for the Bankers Mutual Relief Association of Aberdeen, Dak., was found dead in a field near Ashby, Minn. He had been on a protracted spree that with the intense heat of the day caused his death. His mother and son reside in Richland Center, Wis. Among the papers found on his person was an unpaid pension certificate and his discharge from the army. He was a member of the 36th Wisconsin. He had no money and was buried by the county.

Mrs. Emery A. Storrs, widow of the celebrated orator and lawyer, is lying fatally ill at the home of W. J. Guest, her late husband's stenographer at Chicago. She was stricken with paralysis while visiting at Mr. Guest's house, and the physicians in attendance state that death will ensue within twenty-four hours. The husband also died from paralysis.

The Washington Post gives publicity to another anonymous attack on Judge Fuller signed simply "A Union Man." The writer states that Mr. Fuller's confirmation is held up because in the Illinois legislature in 1863 he voted for a resolution denouncing the emancipation proclamation; he supported a resolution that no amendment should ever be made to the constitution to abolish or interfere with with any state with the domestic institution thereof, voted against the bill to extend the right of suffrage to the volunteer soldiers of Illinois and never had such a a place at the bar as would justify his appointment to the position of chief justice of the United States.

At St. Paul the other night a pistol shot was heard in Lafayette park. A police officer rushed to the scene, and on searching the grounds found a man, apparently about sixty-five years of age, with head bent down, sitting on one of the park benches. At his side was a 32-caliber revolver, one barrel of which was discharged. His clothes were examined and letters found which proved his name to be George Hartman, was running a saloon in St. Paul. What his motive was in committing the rash act is not yet known.

Auditor Ward of Dakota has served notice on the Northwestern Mutual Insurance Company of Wahpeton that it must cease doing business in the territory, as the report of the public examiner shows it to be insolvent.

The Prohibitionists of the Forty-second legislative district met at Morris, Minn., in mass convention. There were forty persons present. After discussion as to whether or not the voters of the two old parties were equally guilty with the saloon keepers, a compromise was effected on the word jointly. Then they nominated J. O. Barret of Brown's Valley for representative. Those present from Stevens county made the following nominations: Auditor J. J. Pimm; treasurer, H. Whiteley; probate judge, W. H. Miles; clerk of court; A. Young; superintendent of schools, Rev. Smith.

Archie McDonald, a farmer of Straith clair, Manitoba, was found hanging by the neck in his house dead. He evidently committed suicide.

John Bowans, colored was taken from the jail at Union Bridge, Ind., by a band of ten or fifteen colored men, all masked, and carried to the outskirts of town where he was strung up by the neck to the limb of a large oak tree. He motioned to be let down, and the rope was slackened so that he could speak. He made use of the opportunity, and slipping through the rope was away like a shot. The lynchers gave chase and fired several shots after him, but without effect. He has not yet been recaptured. Bowans in a fit of jealousy attacked with a razor another colored man and a girl with whom he was walking.

Information from Stevens county, Kansas, the scene of the railroad and county seat fight, between the town of Hugsten and Woodsdale, is to the effect that the entire population is under arms. The situation is serious and farmers are riding around armed instead of tilling the soil, and all crops are likely to fail consequently. Gov. Martin has commanded the militia to be in readiness for marching orders at any time. It is hoped that the mandate issued by the supreme court ordering the commissioners of Stevens county to re-canvass the vote polled at the recent railroad bond election, will have the effect of quieting matters.

A collision occurred on the Pennsylvania road in Philadelphia, by which 20 freight cars were wrecked. One car was loaded with refined oil, which caught fire from a hot box, and the cars were almost entirely destroyed with the greater part of their contents. Estimated loss, $5,000, on which there is no insurance. No one was injured.

A diver named Joe Anderson, of Detroit, while searching for a wreck at Point au Frames discovered a heavy box in deep water, which upon examination was found to be sunk with heavy weights attached to the box with chains. He returned to the village and after procuring assistance managed to raise the box, when to the horror of all it was discovered to contain the remains of an apparently young woman, doubled up and forced into the box. She was well dressed. Whether a dark deed has been committed or not is it hard to say, but there were no indications of an ordinary burial.

A marriage which favored very strongly of the Nina Van Zandt-Spies episode, with the proxy arrangement left out, took place in the county jail at St. Cloud. Mary Esther Gouro, of Verndale, and Arthur Makepiece, who is sentenced to ten years in state prison for forgery, were married by Justice H. G. Wire. The bride, who is rather a handsome woman came to St. Cloud soon after Makepiece's incarceration sometime ago, and secured a position as diningroom girl in the Grand Central hotel under the name of Beulah Dewell, and after her marriage resumed her position in the hotel.

Edward F. Stokes got into a row with a young broker named Trumbridge, near the Hoffman House in New York. Stokes grabbed the other fellow by the nose, and in less time than it takes to relate it several hundred lawyers, brokers and men-about-town were congregated on the sidewalk. Just when it was most exciting a truckman elbowed his way through the crowd and parted the combatants. As soon as Mr. Stokes' fingers were forced apart a great stream of dark blood poured from the nostrils of the little broker.

Chamber's Journal.

As we walked along through the jungle I failed to keep up with the other members of the party, who had got on some distance ahead, when suddenly I heard a rustle in the under wood, and almost at the same moment an enormous tiger presented himself and prepared to spring upon me. I had never seen a more magnificent beast, and I could not help admiring him notwithstanding the danger of my position. But there was no time to be lost. I immediately presented my rifle and fired. As ill-luck would have it, neither shot struck; and in another second the tiger was on me and had thrown me down, his claws buried in my left shoulder. I had no particulare sensation of fear, and I remember thinking quite calmly, as I lay on the ground, the tiger's hot breath coming against my face, "It's all up with me now." But at that moment my faithful little Mungo came to the rescue he bit the tiger's tail so severely, that the beast immediately released his hold and turned round to seize its new adversary. But Mungo, as sharp and wary as he was plucky, was off in the tall grass in an instant. The tiger followed; but the dog had the advantage over him, as it could run through the grass and under the brushwood at a pace which the other could not keep up with. In fact it was almost comical to see how the great creature bounded about in its useless chase after the dog. But I knew that the tiger, disappointed of seizing Mungo, would soon be back again to attack his master; so I reloaded my gun and stood awaiting his return. In a short time he was before me once more; and again I levelled my gun as well as I could, considering the pain in my left shoulder. The first shot missed; but the second struck the tiger in the shoulder, crippled him, and made him roll about in agony. Reloading as rapidly as possible, I went nearer to him, aimed very deliberately, and this time gave him his quietus. Scarcely had I done so before Mungo came bounding up to me, looking into my face, and whining as if with joy at seeing me safe.

Bitten by a Cobra and Lives.

London Standard.

Dr. Vincent Richards has been granted an experience unique, probably in the annals of mankind—fairly bitten by a cobra, he has felt no consequences. At this moment, doubtless, he regrets the natural irritation which led him to kill the reptile. We may safely assume that its fangs were in working order; but it would have been more satisfactory to have had clear proof. Dr. Richards collected a number of snakes for some experiment—in these cases one can never be sure what class of experiment will turn up, however. A lively cobra upset the program, fastening upon the operator's hand. He laid the finger open to the bone, above the wound, and applied permanganate of potash—gentlemen of prudent disposition who consort with snakes keep such materials handy. Then he drove off for advice. Dr. Macleod and Sir Benjamin Simpson re-opened the gash, cauterized it with nitric acid, and the story ends. More than two months have passed, and Dr. Richards may pose, if he thinks fit, as the hero of an adventure hitherto unparalleled. It is a great pity, though, that he destroyed the snake. Perhaps the remains gave sufficient evidence of its capacity for mischief; but if so, the report should have mentioned it. We should like to know, also, how much time was wasted in the impulse of indignation—but that will never be ascertained. For all his presence of mind, Dr. Richards did not consult a stop watch, probably, in fact, if he had, the story would have been yet shorter than it is. In treating the bite of a cobra a man must work against time at awful odds, for one pulse beat which carries the poison into the system carries death—at least such is the impression of the authorities, and this case will be immensely valuable if it show good reason to think that the idea is exaggerated.

During a storm at Chatfield, Minn., lightning struck the house of Berlet Gunderson, four miles south of that place and killed two children.

A. P. Clarkson, a farmer laborer was murdered by John Lowry at West Point Illinois. When four rods distant Lowry discharged a double-barrel shotgun. The murderer then advanced within eight feet of his victim and fired again, the charge taking effect in the neck. Shortly after Lowry's wife was found dead in the house and is supposed to have been murdered by her jealous husband. Clark had been accused by Lowry of sustaining illicit relations with his wife. The murderer has escaped and officers are in pursuit.

Can a Man Swallow a Cannon-ball?

Well, "that depends." He can if his throat is large enough and the cannon-ball not too large. The question really seems worthy of some consideration in view of the size of some of the pills that are prescribed for suffering humanity. Why not throw them "to the dogs" and take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets? Small sugar-coated, purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, in glass, and always fresh.

If you thin out your fruit what is left will be thinner and better.

A special excursion train from the scene of the floods at Cloquet was delayed five hours at West Superior by defective orders to the conductor. The passengers becoming enraged at the long delay formed a gang of mutiny and went through the parlor coaches smashing furniture and windows. A Good Appetite

INTENTIONAL DUPLICATE EXPOSURE

BANNERS.

Emerson.

Grace, Beauty and Caprice
Build this golden portal:
Graceful women, chosen men
Dazzle every mortal.
Their sweet and lofty countenance
His enchanted food;
He need not go to them, their forms
Beset his solitude.
He looketh seldom in their face,
His eyes explore the ground—
The green grass is a looking-glass
Whereon their traits are found.
Little and less he says to them.
So dances his heart in his breast,
Their tranquil mien bereaveth him,
Of wit, of words, of rest.
Too weak to win, too fond to shun
The tyrants of his doom,
The much deceived Endymion
Slips behind a tomb.

MRS. DOBBS' "WHIM."

From the Argosy.

Mr. and Mrs. Dobbs lived at Clapham. They werea very worthy couple, their friends said. That is about the best people will say of an elderly pair if they are not intellectual or troublesome. Mr. and Mrs. Dobbs were neither. Mr. Dobbs was stout and commonplace in appearance, and did not flirt with his neighbor's wife, or gamble in stocks, or live beyond his income. He was hall-marked among upright men, and was trustee for half his friends' children. No doubt he was a trifle heavy and prosy at times, but these are drawbacks frequently attendant upon men of probity. He certainly was never tempted by impulses or inspirations of any sort either to do wrong or to become witty or original.

Mrs. Dobbs was reputed a respectable and virtuous matron for other reasons. Imprimis, she had no taste in dress; neither did she paint her face or excite the envy and spite of her female friends by beautifying her house. She was fond of a good dinner of a solid English sort, and always wore black silk or satin gowns. Her caps were preposterous erections of lace, with gilt or steel ornaments attached; and when she went to the theater she wore a red bernouse. Truly this couple were left behind in the race of extravagance, frivolity and eccentricity. Fashionable folks would have nothing to say to them; those who did consider them worth cultivating explained their status as "good, worthy people," with a compassionate shrug or smile.

Mr. Dobbs was "something in the city," and his big office and many clerks brought in something more than a comfortable income. Yet he made no parade of wealth and kept household accounts strictly. Every evening he returned home punctually by the 6 o'clock train from Waterloo, carrying his fish basket with him. Fish was cheaper and better in the city than at Clapham, and Mrs. Dobbs was particularly fond of fish. The worthy Josiah would not have spoiled her dinner for the world. She must have her salmon in season, and her red mullet and whitebait, all in due turn, of the best. By this you will understand that Mr. Dobbs was devoted and domestic. Yet there were thorns amid the roses of his conjugal paradise. Mrs. Dobbs was now and again beset by spirits of unrest and discontent, and her whims at intervals caused dear, steady-going Josiah much inconvenience. There were no children at Clarence Villa; and perhaps for this reason Mrs. Dobbs had more leisure for complaint. She practiced the art of murmuring with as steady a persistence as a prima donna her scales. Josiah suffered her discontents with more than the ordinary patience of an exemplary husband.

As years went on Josiah philosophically gave up wishing for an heir, seeing his Dorothy had grown portly and middle aged. He subscribed largely to the various charities not having a legitimate outlet for his human kindness. A philoprogenitive organ impelled him toward children's hospitals. Why, said he, should not his generation benefit instead of they that were to come after?

Mrs. Dobbs did not however, view such matters with equanimity Seeing the undue and unwelcome number of olive branches round about other people's tables, she resented nature's cruelty to herself. She, therefore, frowned persistently on Josiah's philanthropic schemes for other people's children. His benevolence toward orphans, foundlings and waifs and strays was a never-ceasing cause of argument and mortification to her. She did not suffer any loss, personally, from these charitable deeds. Not a wish remained ungranted, and checks were fortheoming with cheerful readiness when required. She had her carriage, her servants, her milliners as she listed. Josiah erected a miniature Crystal Palace in his garden because she wished to have bananas growing. He took her to Egypt one Winter, and nearly died of seasickness by the way, because she had been reading Eastern romances and yearned for Oriental glitter. Nothing that money could obtain was denied her—only she had no children.

For a long time Mrs. Dobbs had displayed no extraordinary caprice. Josiah was sailing along in wonderfully smooth matrimonial waters. But the lady's frequent absence of mind and contemplative mein might have convinced a more sophisticated man that mischief was brewing. In truth Mrs. Dobbs was slowly hatching a scheme which she felt sure would run counter to Josiah's wishes. This lent an additional zest to her plan. She considered it a retributive scheme. She would fight Josiah on his own ground with his favorite weapon of benevolence.

"I'm going to adopt a child, Josiah. Now. it's no use your contradicting me, because I won't listen," said the lady one evening over dessert. She spoke aggressively, cracking the shell of a walnut with decision. She peevishly found fault with the fish and the salad, and had slapped her pug for no earthly reason. If Josiah had been less slow he would have opined that a storm was brewing. There was silence for a minute after Mrs. Dobbs had opened fire.

"Aren't you going to speak?" she said at length.

"A child," remarked Josiah, dropping his fat chin into his shirt. "My love, that is surely a project requiring very serious consideration."

Mrs. Dobbs tossed her head ominously. Every inch of lace in her cap seemed suddenly to have acquired starch, while the gilt ornaments thereon scintillated fiercely.

"When I say a thing I mean it, as you know, Josiah. I have considered that you indulge your hobbies without restraint. It is high time my benevolence found something to occupy it."

Josiah drank up his wine slowly. When he spoke again it was in a subdued tone.

"Dorothy, my dear, how often have I reminded you in the past three years that your poor sister—left a child. As I have said before, it is your clear duty—"

"Mr. Dobbs!" The lady rose, and swept her black satin skirts to the door. Here she paused to add: "I repeat, I remember no sister. A disgraceful marriage severed all connection of birth. I beg that you will never allude to that shameful matter again."

Perhaps the episode alluded to was well remembered by Josiah, for he sighed several times in his after-dinner solitude. He knew the mad-cap girl he had sheltered for many years beneath his roof was dead, but he knew, too, that her child lived, and he would fain have cherished it for the mother's sake.

In the course of the evening Mrs. Dobbs resumed the question of adoption. Josiah was a peaceable man, and he loved his wife; but this last whim was a serious one, and would inevitably entangle her in difficulties.

"I'm going to advertise at once," she said.

Mr. Dobbs looked very blank.

"I should advise you to try some other plan that would give less publicity to the matter," he said mildly. "That would bring any amount of beggars and inpostors about you."

Mrs. Dobbs looked over her crewel work in an injured way.

"There you are again, Josiah; always trying to oppose me and make my life miserable. I declare you contradict me every morning and evening about something. Haven't I told you before what a lonely life I lead? It's all very well for you, who go away to the city every day to make money. You are just like all men—you are selfish to the core." With this final female platitude, Mrs. Dobbs began to whimper. Mr. Dobbs felt guilty of heinous cruelty.

"A companion might——"he began.

"A companion!" with withering sarcasm, "to make love to you, no doubt, Josiah. I know their scheming ways. Didn't I have enough of Miss Griggs and her maneuvering tricks, working you braces, the hussy, and sending you Christmas cards. How dare you mention a person of that sort after all my sufferings with them?"

Of course in the end the lady prevailed, and Josiah passively countenanced the adoption. Matters were soon set in order for the fulfillment of the latest whim. Yet verily her heart failed her during the week following her advertisement. Her lonely condition had never been so apparent to her before as when she was beset by a crew of parents and guardians bearing some puny or blighted infant for her adoption. All sorts and conditions of men craved her pity for their wretched children. She was bewildered by the offensive bearing of bolder applicants. More than once Mrs. Dobbs had to ring in her respectable butler to get rid of some insistant parent who endeavored to intimidate her into an immediate purchase. The result of all this was a cessation of the daily advertisement. Mr. Dobbs, of course, was not informed minutely of all that went on, though an interview with his butler one evening threw a little light on things that had occurred.

"I wish to give a month's warning, sir," said this gentleman in privacy to his master.

"Why, now, Tinker, what is the matter? I'm sure you've a very comfortable place, with a boy to do all your dirty work."

Tinker coughed and stammered a few words before coming to the point. "Well, now, sir, to speak plain it's along of that wild crowd of vagabonds, as Mrs. Dobbs she's seeing of every day. Babies by the score, they're brought by impident rascals such as I ain't been accustomed to. One of 'em she wouldn't go out of the gate till I called the police. It aint respectable in a gentleman's house, I do assure you, sir."

Somehow or other Mr. Dobbs managed to sooth the outraged feelings of his man servant, and prevailed upon him to put up awhile longer with the inconvenience of the situation. The worthy Josiah was concerned for the protection of his wife.

"How are you getting on with your business, my love?" inquired Mr. Dobbs that evening.

"Oh, pretty well," said the lady cheerfully, yet persistently avoiding her husband's eyes. "I find it very difficult to make up my mind; and I want a pretty little boy, not quite a baby, with no disgraceful connections to hang about him. No doubt I shall see one to suit me in a few days."

The few days passed without further allusion to the subject, and the following curious advertisement appeared in all the daily papers:

WANTED.—For immediate adoption, a little boy between 2 and 4 years old. Must be healthy and pretty and sound in body and mind. The parents or relatives must renounce all claim on him forever. He will be comfortably provided for in the future. Apply daily to Messrs. Griffham and Grabham, Solicitors, 201 Parliament street, Westminster.

After the appearance of this advertisement the persecution of Clarence Villa died away, and only now and again a respectable man or woman, leading a little boy, was heard inquiring for Mrs. Dobbs' residence of a local policeman. But the lady was obdurate to all claims made on her pity. See had hardened her heart to destitute cases; and penniless widows or consumptive fathers met with scant ceremony at her hands if their offspring were not desirable. After this had gone for a fortnight or more, Mrs Dobbs one day visited Messrs. Griffham and Grabham during business hours.

"I have come about the child, Mr. Griffham," she said, going at once to her point. "How is it you have sent me none that are pretty or interesting?" From the force of habit, Mrs. Dobbs was apt to speak dictatorially to strangers.

"My dear madam, pray remember children are not made to order."

Mrs. Dobbs winced. "I see I must except no assistance from you, sir," she said loftily. No doubt my husband's opposition to my object has influenced you, I will trouble you no further in this matter. You may consider your quest at an end. Good morning."

Weary of her undertaking, Mrs. Dobbs had almost resolved to abandon her whim. She chewed the cud of bitter thoughts on her homeward way that day. Providence or fortune was against her success. That evening Mr. Dobbs came home in an unusual degree of haste, and of a cheerful mien.

"Love," said he, tripping over the dining-room mat, "I've found a child for you."

Mrs. Doobs looked up coldly. "It's impossible I shall like it," said she perversely. "No one wants to part with a child unless there's something the matter with it."

Mr. Doobs beamed yet more brightly. He was not to be subdued by any wet blankets. "It's a little boy, and he is 3 years old, fair, pretty and most intelligent. His father is just dead."

"What about his mother?" queried Mrs. Doobs cautiously.

Josiah reddened, stammering a little. "She—ah, poor soul—is dead too. This is no beggar's brat. He is well born, Dorothy, on one side. I can give you every proof."

The next day the child was brought to Clapham and left a Clarence Villa by a clerk from M. Dobbs' office. He was poorly dressed, but a handsome little lad, lively and spirited. He was not at all shy, and addressed himself freely to the pug and parrot. The piping treble voice and shrill, childish laughter touched the maternal chord in Dorothy's heart. She went a little sadly that day while her eyes followed the child. He stroked her velvet gown and fingered her rings while he sat upon her knee, chatting about the things around him.

"What is your name?" questioned the lady.

"Harry," answered the boy readily But nothing more could be elicited from him. He did not seem to understand that he could have a second name. He was but a baby boy, scarcely three.

In the afternoon Mrs. Dobbs telegraphed to her husband that he must make arrangements for her to keep the child a day or two. It would not be necessary to send any one to fetch him that evening. The day passed quickly, with little feet pattering beside her, exploring the wonders of garden and greenhouses. Towards 7 o'clock Mrs. Dobbs began to look anxiously for her spouse's return. She had quite decided that she would keep the child, but still there were questions to be asked—preliminaries to be settled. The boy must be hers entirely. None must ever claim him, or interfere with his welfare. Mr. Dobbs came leisurely up the garden at his usual hour, carrying his fish-bag. His stolid face changed a little when he looked through the window and saw the child on his wife's knee.

"He is a pretty boy, Dorothy," he said nervously, when he came near.

"A darling little boy; I mean to keep him, Josiah," she said, gently disengaging the chubby hands from her chair. "Will you stay with me, Harry?"

"Stay with oo; pity, pity flowers," he cried clapping his hands.

"Tell me all you know about him, Josiah. What is his parentage, and will his nearest relatives surrender all claim upon him?"

Josiah shifted uneasily in his seat. He had the appearance of a man oppressed with guilt.

"He is an orphan," said he looking speculatively at his own broad toes.

"So much the better for me,' said Mrs. Dobbs. But I will have no distant reltaives hanging about. He must belong exclusively to me."

Mr Dobbs drew nearer to his wife.

"Dorothy, he ought to belong to you if to anyone."

The lady put down the child from her knee. His large blue eyes gazed in wonder at this sudden rejection.

"What is the boy's name?" said Mrs. Dobbs, breathlessly.

"Henry," he rejoined, slowly.

"But Henry what?" she asked, more sharply.

"Henry Morrison. He is your sister's child—a friendless orphan now. God help him if you don't.

Mrs. Dobbs fell back on the sofa cushion, and covered her face with her hands. The tears were falling through them when little fingers essayed to move them.

"Has oo, been naughty? on't ky."

Perhaps the lady was very conscious of her own naughtiness, for she cried still more at this appeal, drawing the child into her embrace. There was never any more doubt about the adoption. Henry Morrison calls Mrs. Dobbs mother to this day, and Josiah is a little less generous toward asylums and hospitals. There will be a very pretty penny by and by for his adopted son.

Public Schools in the West.

The public-school system in the West, when once the long dormant germ was fully matured, was a plant of rapid, though substantial, growth. But little more than a quater of a century has elapsed since the awakening began and the true value and importance of the free school became generally recognized. In nothing else has there ever been a more wonderful or more noble progress. The log school-houses have vanished, to give place to handsome, often elegant, frame, brick, and stone edifices. Instead of the rudeness and discomfort which characterized the district school of the earlier day every necessary convenience is at hand to give pleasure to the pupil and lend assistance to the teacher. The pride of every village is its school building and its efficient public school, in which every child may receive, free of cost, the best instructions that is anywhere afforded.

It was in the West that the idea of graded schools was first completely formulated and made practically successful. It was in the West that the superintendency of schools—county and city—was first generally recognized as essential to the success of the system. It was in the West that the earliest and some of the ablest expounders of the "new education," in this country, attempted the practical application of their theories. While yet the country was about half settled and the public school system little more than a promise, a former pupil of Pestalozzi introduced the methods of that reformer into the private schools of the lower Wabash Valley. Long before a "new departure" had been discovered in the schools of Quincy, and heralded to the world as the beginning of a great reformation, self-same methods, there so highly eulogized, were being practically demonstrated in scores of cities and towns in the West.

LOVE LIGHTENS LABOR.

And thought with a nervous dread
Of the pile of clothes to be washed, and more
Than a dozen mouths to be fed.
There's the meals to be got for the men in the field,
And the children to fix away
To school, and the milk to be skimmed and churned;
And all to be done that day.

It had rained in the night, and all the wood
Was as wet as it could be;
And there were puddings and pies to bake, beside
A loaf of bread for tea.
And the day was hot, and her aching head
Throbbing wearily, as she said,
"If maidens but knew what good wives know,
They would be in no haste to wed."

"Jennie, What think you I told Ben Brown?"
Called the farmer from the well;
And a flush crept up to his bronzed brow,
And his eyes half bashfully fell;
"It was this;" he said, and coming near,
He smiled, and stooping down,
Kissed her cheek—"twas this, that you were the best
And dearest wife in town!"

The farmer went back to the field, and the wife,
In a smiling and absent way,
Sang snatches of tender little songs
She'd not sang for many a day.
And the pain in her head was gone, and the clothes
Were white as the foam of the sea;
Her bread was light, and her butter was sweet,
And golden as it could be.

"Just think," the children all called, in a breath,
"Tom Wood has run off to sea!
He wouldn't I know, if he had only had
As happy a home as we."
The night came down, and the good wife smiled
To herself, as she softly said:
"Tis so sweet to labor for those we love.
It's not strange that maids will wed!"

THE TERRIBLE TREE.

I was studying, smoking and generally ruining my constitution in the little college town of N——, one fierce winter when a settled apathy took possession of me. I lost my interest in everything. Frequently, to rouse my dormant energies, I walked down to the beach and plunged in the icy surge; but it availed nothing. Books, cigars—all were ineffectual. Life looked a dreary waste. The cold, objectless fields, covered with snow, seemed to me to image forth the future. Like most very young men I had exhausted sensation. As I sat by my little table one evening in January I ran over in my mind the possible stimulants I could use to lash my dormant sensibilities into life. I could not take to drinking, because, like Dick Swiveller, I had taken to that before. I could not take opium; that made me deadly sick, and subsequently sleepy. Was there any mental stimulent, such as love, hate, remorse, that I had not tried? No. I hated everybody. I had been in love with all the "college widows" and several besides. "Man pleasured me not; no, nor women either." Remorse! I had disobeyed my father and grieved my mother. I felt, I suppose, suitable remorse for these things, but they were peccadilloes and did not answer.

Remorse!—the word pleased me. Should I stick a knife into the fat sides of my landlady? Would her innocent blood crying to heaven and her last gasp calling me "Murderer!" make my pulse beat quicker? No, she was old, cheating, asthmatic. She would have had no innocent blood to cry with. She could not have cried "Murderer!" audibly, on account of the asthma, and I think she would have welcomed death as an agreeable exchange from a life spent in taking boarders. Where was the victim whom I could offer up to my dying sensation? What Iphigenia knelt before the dull gleam of my languid knife? Where—Tap, tap, tap! as if a ghostly finger touched my window pane.

I started! Yes, I actually started. The ocean in January had greeted my numbed frame as if it had been a warm vapor bath. Thoughts of murder, of poison, of love, of fame had crept through my veins as languidly as a thought of paying an old debt. What these things had not done a tap did.

I looked out—nothing there. The cold moon looked down on the cold earth; the cold snow surrounded the cold white house; the leafless trees outlined themselves on the cold sky, the cold charity student, shivering in his thin coat, went by, making coldness visible.

Tap, tap, tap!

For the first time I saw—would that I had never seen it again—I saw the tree! An old, lightning-struck, dead sycamore, with two branches left, and a charred top with one hole burned in it by the lightning. There it stood, a horrible cyclop, tossing its two skeleton arms in the air, and looked at me with its one eye. One arm leaned over towards my window and a skeleton forefinger tapped on the glass.

I knew what it was. A demon lived in that tree and wanted to make my acquaintance. I nodded to the tree. I should be happy to make the gentleman's acquaintance. A gust of wind surged through and through the tree, and a horrible "Ha! ha!" died away in the air.

I had seen the tree before, of course. There it had stood a year before my chamber window, but I had never seen it as I saw it to night. Formerly to me it was a burned, dead tree Now it was a familliar, companionable demon. I determined to get something out of that tree.

Just as I had admitted the tree to my confidence the door bell rang. Loud, importunate to be let in, the ringer spake through the quivering wire, and I was convinced it was a new comer. No one who had been quenched in the atmosphere of that house could ring in that way. Presently I heard trunks brought in, then strange voices, then going upstairs. I looked up at the tree. He waved a giant finger at me, as much as to say, "Go down and find out." Charming! I felt curiosity—always a sign of vitality. I encouraged it by waiting. I said to myself, "We will find out tomorrow, my good fellow, keep quiet" all the while slyly meaning to ask Susan, the chambermaid, whom I heard, with no fairy footfalls, ascending and descending the stairs.

Susan had a great contempt for me. Whether several years of residence in a boarding-house had given Susan a disgust for her species, or whether she was actually a misanthrope, or whether again, I, of the whole human race, had failed to impress Susan's mind with my superior claims to respect, certain it was that Susan had not that amenity of manner or activity of service where I was concerned which would have been expected from our relative positions. If my pitchers were ever full of water, my boots ever at the door where they should have been, I have only to say it was the exception and not the rule. Susan's manner, too, of answering a question was abrupt and not particularly respectful. So I was not surprised on opening my door and addressing a timid interrogatory to Susan to the effect that I should like to know who had arrived that she should answer somewhat in this wise: Go away, Mr. Sidney, don't be a-botherin' me, who is tired and distracted to death now." However, Susan was a woman, and could not resist the pleasure of telling a piece of news.

"There is a gentleman and a lady and a sick one, and lots of trunks;and the sick one has fainted away, and they is bringin' her to."

I shut my door and looked out at the tree. He nodded and winked his one eye at me and tossed his branches in wild delight. We understood each other perfectly. Iphigenia had arrived; I saw it at a glance. This fainting person was evidently a sick girl who had been brought to this house by her parents. She would recover slowly. I would fascinate her, and if she did not then die I would kill her? Yes! In the dead of the night I would ascend to the third floor, front, wake her from her childlike sleep, and then, calmly, cooly, like Mr. Forrest on the stage. I would plunge my knife into her pure bosom, and walk away, "wrapping my mantle round me," and "keep my dreadful secret to eat out my heart."

I made my preparations with fiendish coolness. I looked long and steadily in the depths of a looking-glass, making my countenance as interesting as the case would permit. I pulled out of a drawer a blue cravat, which in a moment of previous despair I had rejected, but which became me much. I spent an hour or so over my hair and curled my lip until it was quite lame. These preparations over, I had nothing before me but the mundane necessity of going to bed. As common life, with its perpetual grind of buttons and boots and shaving, came back to me, I relapsed again into apathy and began to tire even of the idea of killing the girl. The tree kept me up and nodded and winked in the most uncommon manner.

She was not at breakfast—no, nor at dinner. I heard, too, to my disgust, that she was married—a Mrs. Brown! Evening came, and alone in my room I tried not to see the tree; but look where I would, so firmly was it daguerreotyped on my mind that I could but see it and ever and anon came the tap, tap, as if to remind me I was not alone.

Mrs. Brown was traveling with her nurse and physician. Who or where was Mr. Brown did not appear. One day I stopped the nurse in the hall and inquired for her mistress. She told me she was better and would be down in a day or two. As for the physician, he was a very silent, dissagreeable fellow, with gray hair and a young face, a contradictory sort of expression and a pair of eyes which never met yours.

As a proof that I got better of my apathy about this time, I will mention that, in passing through the halls, I heard the nurse ask Susan who that young man was who spoke to her. Susan replied: "Oh, a miserable kind of a dyspepsia feller—he don't know nothing."

As a psychological fact, and a proof that I had come to have some feeling, I was very glad to observe that the remark aroused in me a considerable degree of wrath.

That evening I saw Mrs. Brown! As I came home at twilight I went up to my room, but before entering it I sprang back as from an electric shock, for coming out of it was a woman—the strangest woman! a small, pale, gaunt woman, with black eyes and great hollows around them, dressed in black and white—a stormy sky with a moon shining in it.

"Excuse me, sir, I have mistaken your door for mine," said a voice which froze the marrow in my bones—a low dreadful voice, as if coming from the tombs. I scarcely remember what followed. I knew I loved her. She had but to ask me a question and I turned to listen to her. She held me spell-bound. How strange, how wonderful was her talk! She spoke of dreams, of omens, of that wonderful power of the Indian jugglers who could compel dreams. She believed in trances. Common life did not appear to touch her. Some sirocco seemed to have blown over her and withered all her blooms. So strikingly did she make the impression on me that I once voluntarily asked her, "Were you ever struck by lightning?"

She did not show any surprise at the question, but immediately answered, "Yes, and completely scathed."

She was dreadfully ill. Sometimes she was brought down and put in a carriage almost like a child. Sometimes moans of agony reached me from her room. Once I accidently touched her hand—it burned me. Yet now and then she talked with almost superhuman energy, grappling with great social problems, and thinking and working like a strong man.

I loved her. No one knew it but the tree, and he only pointed a skinny arm at me in derision. "Dying!" he seemed to moan—"Dyingj" echoed the wind, that went sobbiding through his branches.

One night, when the wave of life seemed to surge more strongly in the breast, and she had a flash of strength I told her I loved her. I took one of those burning, attenuated hands and said, "Live for me—I love you!"

She looked at me with unuutterable pity.

"Poor boy, you had better never been born!"

I did not attempt to answer her. As soon would I have answered the ocean, had it thrown me like weed on the rocks.

I have answered the ocean, had it thrown me like weed on the rocks.

Still I sat by her side—still I strove to move her easy chair to the most sheltered corner—still I marked with growing anguish the fading light of her face. One evening, as I was so occupied, my landlady burst into the room and uttered "Murder! murder!" and sank into her chair, crying and sobbing.

"Who is it?" we both said.

"Mr. Montague Lewis has been found murdered in his bed. No one went to his room till an hour ago, when his servant got alarmed, opened his door and found him dead—stabbed! Oh, dear! Oh, dear."

"Was he quite dead?" said Mrs. Brown, in her calm, sepulchral voice.

"Quite. Oh, what a family! and Mr. Clifford not here; and whatever became of his wife, I should like to know? There is something wrong somewhere," and with this profound reflection our fat and asthmatic informant left us.

These gentlemen—the murdered man and his brother—belong to an old family in N——. They were the redgauntlets of the neighborhood. Handsome, aristocratic-looking men, they were reserved to an uncommon decree, and shunning every one, were shunned in their turn. Dreadful stories of the bad passions of the race lingered about in the neighborhood. Hard, cold men, with compressed lips, they walked occasionally through the streets, or were seen in the libray, bowing distantly to an acquaintance and frequently disappearing from the town for a year or so, going no one knew whither. Clifford Lewis, the youngest brother was not at home when the murder took place. A poor old housekeeper was alone in the house. She said she had heard a noise in the night, had risen and looked over the stairs.

"I saw a man," she said, "going out of my master's room; I called to him, and he answered me in my master's voice, saying: 'It is I, Rebecca, do not fear; go to your room again.' I thought then I knew his voice so well, and so I went to bed. In the morning he did not come down; but that often happened, and he always told me not to wake him, he was such a poor sleeper. I waited till night, and then—oh that Mr. Clifford would come!"

In a few days Mr. Clifford came. The community was shaken with fear. All that money and the law could do to ferret out the murderer was tried ineffectually.

Mr. Clifford Lewis, contrary to his wont, went much to public places, stimulating officials to do their duty, and showing capacity and zeal. He was a strikingly handsome man and had one of the most beautiful voices I had ever heard. He impressed me so much that I came home determined to describe him to Mrs. Brown.

"I should think such men would be irresistible to women," I said; "strength in repose."

"And so they are, "said Mrs. Brown. "But have you ever thought what that manner indicates? Do you know what becomes of the poor victim who is grasping by that iron hand in a velvet glove? I will tell you. She shrinks, she trembles, she crouches in submission; but she escapes—and, turning, she stings her tyrant as a playful, tortured, serpent turns and stings!"

How this woman's voice thrilled me through! What terrible quality had it that made my blood freeze in my brain?

"They sting! they sting!" she reiterated.

Night came again. The tree told me a horrible secret that night. It whispered a word that kept sleep from my eyes. In the dead of night I heard a foot on the stairs; I heard a door shut above my head. These sounds confirmed my worst imaginings. The tree beckoned me out into the stormy night; it threw one arm wildly up in the air and pointed to her window.

The demon beckoned me up. I climbed up the jagged trunk of the old tree, reaching one of the long arm-like branches, and crept along its frail and swaying support. A dull light shining in the room showed me that woman—her pale hands bloody, her person disguised in men's clothes, her eyes gleaming with superhuman lustre and fiendish triumph.

Morning came, and with it crowds of agitated pale men and women shrieking with terror at the news of another murder.

Yes, Clifford Lewis, with his handsome, cruel face, lay murdered in his bed.

The proof was this: A man's track was discovered leading past the old tree, from the house in which he lived to mine, and near one of the tracks, and clinging to the torn bark of the tree, was my handkerchief.

I only asked one favor of the crowd of angry men who seized upon me as if I were a wild beast, and that was that I might write a note. They assented, but when they saw it was addressed to the poor dying woman upstairs they all said "No."

"The man is mad," said one, "we will not allow the poor invalid to be alarmed by his ravings."

But thegray-haired young physician offered to take it for me.

I wrote her these words: "Be firm—the dead sycamore and I alone know we are both incapable of speaking."

I sat on the stone floor of the prison awaiting the morning. I knew that I loved a monster, but I loved still. No thought of betraying her came to my mind. All other thoughts—home, friends, good name—were drowned in the all-conquering sea. I recalled my morbid sensation before I saw her, I compared that night's reflection with my present state of feeling. Was I not a murderer at heart? Was it not just that I should be punished for the sin I had conceived but not committed?

Morning came and with it my release. Mrs. Brown had confessed the crime and was dying. She wished to see me. She was lying on a sofa, and by her side a grave old man held her pulse in one hand and his watch in the other. She opened her eyes and held out a feeble hand to me.

"Poor, generous fool, did you think I would let you die," she said? "No, I have killed all I wished to kill. I kept silence until my poor tools—my so-called nurse and physician—could escape. I needed them and used them; but they are innocent, except of knowing me, and they are gone. How long have I?" she asked of the physician.

"Not an hour," he answered solemnly.

"More than enough. I am the wife of Clifford Lewis. He won me by that soft voice which you admired; he crushed me by that iron hand which you saw. I was high-strung, impetuous, passionate. I loved him—God knows how much!—but I defied him. I did not want to be ruled. In this evil hour his brother Montague came to live with us. He treated me kindly and I trusted him. I told him I was unhappy—fatal, weak confession. He was a mean creature. He loved me—he asked me to fly with him. I refused. I told him I hated him. He went away, but left a poisoned arrow. He told his brother that I confessed that I loved him, and he fled to save our happiness."

"How artistically he planned hi revenge! When my husband foun that my pride outstood his cruelty he struck deeper. We had a child"—hear the dying woman struggled fearfully with death and with that agony which is fiercer—"a beautiful blue-eyed boy, with all that is good imaged in his face and not yet blighted by his inheritance of evil. He came at night, when he slept in my arms. I hope he is dead—I have never seen him since.

"I could not die; but there was one thing left for me to do—I could kill. I would cleanse the race from these two plague spots. No other woman should suffer as I had done."

I had a dim consciousness that the room was full of people—that this woman lay dying on a sofa. I could not collect my senses. I dropped on my knees by her side and strove to say a prayer for her soul—her guilty soul. I heard a cry of agony, a convulsed breathing, and I remember nothing more.

A dark room; the same grave old gentlemen; the too familiar face of Susan with a bowl of gruel in her hand. This picture succeded the last.

I tried in vain to reconcile the two.

"There; seems to me he looks sensibler," said Susan.

The doctor (so I imagined) starte up: "Yes, here is a change for the be ter. My dear young friend, how d you feel?"

I answered with a ghost of a voi that I did not know.

"A very bad typhus, a very compl cated important case. You are alive my young friend, through the blessin of God and successful medical tr ment."

"And the tree, is that typhus? Mrs. Brown, is she typhus? And der, and all that, merely typhu

"Malignant typhoid, my dear friend. Great irritation of the preceeded almost always by lo its, strange fancies, delirium, a often death. But you are alive, my friend"—

"Mrs. Brown wishes to know the gentleman is," said a voice at door.

"Decidedly better," said the doc "Poor woman, I wish she had be advice!"

It turned out that I had met Brown at my chamber-door, with fever circulating in my veins, and h fallen down unconscious. The subsequent events had existed but in my fevered brain. I had transmuted two very respectable, snuffy old bachelors into my murdered men, and Mrs. Brown proved to be a very nice, though rather elderly and plain invalid lady, for whom I have the highest respect.

The tree—it was the merest old wreck you ever saw. No respectable demon accustomed to a warm climate would have thought for a moment of taking up his abode in it, particularly his winter quarters.

"But, doctor," said I, after I had got well enough to go downstairs. "I don't like the looks of Mrs. Brown,s physician, after all."

"I know the reason, my dear young friend; our instincts are very apt to be right," said the doctor, who was a two-and-twenty-grains-of-calomel man. "You do well to distrust his countenance; avoid him, he is a homœopathist!"

The shadow of the calomel and of the doctor's awful authority was over me still, so I did not argue the matter, but took his explanation meekly and with a show of credulity.

How Calico Got its Name.

The derivation of this word is very interesting as of such an ancient date is its origin. Mrs. Lenowens says in her "Travels in India," that in the year 1498, just ten months and two days after leaving the port of Lisbon, Vasco da Gama landed on the coast of Malabar at Calicut, or more properly Kala Rhoda, "City of the Black Goddess." Calicut was at that period not only a very ancient seaport, but an extensive territory, which stretching along the western coast of Southern India, reached from Bombay and the adjacent Islands to Cape Comorin. It was at an early period so famous for its weaving and dyeing of cotton cloth that its name became identified with the manufactured fabric, hence the name calico. It is now generally admitted that this ingenious art originated in India in remote ages, and from that country found its way to Egypt.

It was not until the middle of the seventeenth century that calico printing was introduced into Europe. A knowledge of the art was acquired by some of the servants of the Dutch East India Company, and carried to Holland, whence it was introduced in London in the year 1676. It is surprising for grown-up children, as well as our young folks, to learn that "Pliny, as early as the first century mentions in his natural history that there existed in Egypt a wonderful method of dyeing white cloth." Calico cannot be despised when it boasts of such antiquity. The shoddy make-up of the present day may look down with contempt upon the calico dress, "but what kind of lineage has it?" the calico can proudly ask.

A Hairless Man

Cleveland Plaindealer.

For several days past the men and boys, and the women and girls as well at Evansville, Indiana, have been seen to take a startled look and quietly turn about to stare at a certain man whom they chanced to meet upon the street. The object of so much curiosity is John Powers, who is now a farmer in the Sucker state. Powers formely had a full head of curly, black hair and a heavy beard. Now he hasn't a hair on his body. Asked the cause of the metamorphose, Mr. Powers replies that he has no idea what occasioned his loss unless it be the use of quinine. Not long since, he says, he became ill while working in his field He went to the house and took a heavy dose of quinine and went to bed. In two or three days he recovered and and felt as usual, except for a particular numbness of his skin. He went to work again, but soon noticed that his hair and beard were dropping out, and in a week he says he had not a hair left on his entire person. He has grown some what used to his loss and but for the staring at him by people who have not become accustomed to his appearance he would never think of it.

S. G. Comstock.

The Man

Who Will Take Knute Nelson's

Seat In Congress!

Hon. S. G. Comstock was nominated by the republicans of the Fifth District, at St. Cloud on Wednesday June 13th. This grand result was reached about 3 p. m., at the 45th final ballot, though 48 were really had—the informal and two, wherein 100 ballots had been cast. Five candidates entered the race in the start, viz: Judge Stearns, of Duluth, S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, E. E. Corliss, of Fergus Falls, A. Barto, of Sauk Centre, and C. B. Buckman, of Sauk Rapids. On the informal ballot Mr. Comstock received 18 votes and the first formal ballot stood: Stearns, 24; Barto, 26; Comstock, 19; Buckman, 15; Corliss, 14; H. Steenerson, 1; Mr. Comstock never fell below that number during the whole of the long siege that followed. On the 2d he had 19; on the 3d, 21; on the 4th, 23; the 5th 23; the 6th, 21; the 7th, 21; the 8th, 26; the 9th, 26; the 10th, 26; from the 11th to the 16th inclusive 23 each; on the 17th and 18th 24; 19th to 24th, 23 each, when the convention adjourned until morning. He opened out Wednesday morning with 26 on the 25th ballot; gaining two on the 26th ballot, the 27th, was 29; the 28th and 29th, was 28; 30th, 29; 31st 28; 32d and 33d, 29; 34th, 28; 35th, 27; 36th, 26; 37th, 38th and 39th, 37; 40th, 35; 41st, 42d and 43d, 39; 44th, 41; and on the 45th, 50. While this ballot was being counted Mr. Waite, of Todd, (one of Barto's delegates,) moved to make Mr. Comstock's nomination unanimous. This did not suit Otter Tail, who wanted the honor of casting the deciding vote, so Mr. Waite withdrew his motion. When the result was anounced, Clapp of Otter Tail, and Waite and several others jumped to their feet and moved to make the nomination unanimous which was done amid tumultuous applause. A committee was appointed to inform the successful candidate who appeared and made a few appropriate remarks. Mr. Barto, Judge Stearns, C. B. Buckman, E. E. Corliss and Mr. Graves were invited up to say a word and did so, pledging their hearty support of the candidate through the campaign. C. A. Gilman, in response to repeated calls stood up on his chair and made a short and timely speech in which he said that Mr. Comstock was well worthy to succeed Mr. Nelson and congratulated the convention upon its choice. Mr. Barto said that he had heard before of a man being present at his own funeral but this was the first time he had ever known of a man being called upon to preach his own funeral sermon. Said that where all had so fair a chance none could complain; that he was proud of his friends who had so nobly stood by him and that he would now fight hard to elect Mr. Comstock. Judge Stearns said Duluth was dissatisfied in not getting her own man had got her second choice all right and would see to it that Mr. Comstock gets a handsome majority at the polls in November. Mr. Buckman, Mr. Corliss and Mr. Graves pledged themselves to stand by the nomination. It was very evident to one looking over the field on Monday that Mr. Comstock could be nominated easily if his friends only remained true to him, as no one had enough to nominate and Mr. Comstock was second choice of over two-thirds of the delegates in the convention. He had conducted his canvass in so fair and honorable a manner, (as he always does everything) that no one was antagonized and all felt very friendly to him. His nomination gives universal satisfaction and he will be elected by an old-time rousing republican majority.

C. H. Graves, of Duluth, chairman of the committee on resolution presented the following report from the committee on resolutions:

Whereas, we have heretofore demanded certain remedial legislation looking to the equitable distribution of the fruits of labor; the just regulation of the subject of railroad traffic both in state and inter-state commerce to a to a fair and equitable point where the interests of the railroad companies and the interest of the shippers should be fairly and justly considered; and to the full and unrestricted rights of the shipper to reach the markets of the world untrammeled by any unjust burden; and

Whereas, such legislation as the experience of the past would suggest, and in the light of such experience, has already been secured through the efforts of the Republican party; Therefore be it resolved that we demand such additional legislation necessary to fully and fairly adjust the relation of shippers and carriers, to the end that the shipper shall be allowed to ship at a fair and reasonable rate; which rate shall be based upon the actual cost of construction and operating expenses, but that the efforts of the shipper to secure an open market shall not be trammeled by an unjust or unreasonable charges and that the shipper shall exercise the right to transfer at all points of railroad lines without any unjust charge therefor, and that this principle be engrafted upon what is known as the Inter State Commerce Law, and to secure such desired legislation and the enforcement thereof we pledge the earnest efforts of the Republican party.

Resolved, That we insist upon a material and judicious reduction of the tariff especially where it bears heavily upon the producing and agricultural interests and demand that Congress shall cease trifling with this most important subject. That we regard the so-called Mills Bill as presented in Congress, as a subterfuge designed only to deceive, and fraught with mischief, bearing upon its face the unmistakable evidence of having been prepared solely in the spirit of sectional interest, carefully guarding the interests of one section of the country at the expense of another, and we regret that the party in power refuses to meet the question of tariff reduction in a fair and manly spirit. We hold the Democratic party responsible for the war of which the present tariff was a necessary outgrowth, and in view of the failure of that party to reform the tariff after being in possession of the lower house of Congress for several years we cannot but regard their promises of reform as mere pretence, unworthy any respect or serious consideration; and pointing to the fact that all material reduction in the tariff has been secured through the efforts of the Republican party, while the history of the Democratic party upon this subject is a succession of broken pledges, we confidently appeal to the people to entrust this most important subject to the care of the Republican party.

Resolved, That we are in favor of opening, as soon as practicable, all the Indian reservations in the Fifth district, allotting and in severalty to the Indians now residing thereon and disposing of the remainder to actual settlers and purchasers on such terms as Congress may deem best.

Resolved, That we highly appreciate the services of our Congressman Knute Nelson, and feel a pride in the honorable distinction so justly attained by him. He has clearly apprehended his duties and faithfully and ably performed them. No personal schemes have met with his favor but he has labored industriously in the interests of the whole people. We heartily approve of his earnest efforts to regulate Inter State Commerce and to secure a reform and reduction of the tariff, and his action therein has been in accord with the plainly expressed will of the Republican party of this district as enunciated in the platforms upon which he has beene lected, and his constituants consent to his retirement as Congressman only for the reason that he absolutely declines a re-election.

The reading of the platform was greeted with applause, and it was adopted without dissent.

What the Boys Say.

Moorhead News: The people of Moorhead have great reason to feel proud over the success of its able and worthy citizen Hon. S. G. Comstock, who was nominated for congress yesterday. Mr. Comstock went into the convention with only 18 votes pledged to him, but it was apparent almost at once that he had a great deal of reserved strength and that he was second choice of many of the delegates pledged to other candidates. A good deal is due to the shrewd and constant work of his home delegates, and to those of Polk, Becker and Wilkin Counties, but after all his nomination is largely due to his own personal merits and great ability. He is recognized as a good all around man, strong in intellect, sound in judgment and wise in counsel. He is patriotic; a true American and devoutly attached to our institutions. Without disparagement of the other candidates, it may be said that he is altogether the strongest man of the quintette, and in legislative experience excels them all. The Fifth district therefore will be ably represented in congress by Mr. Comstock, and will not suffer any loss of the distinction which the retiring congressman, the Hon. Knute Nelson, has imparted to it. Mr. Comstock will take rank early in his congressional experience among the leaders of the House of Representatives, and we predict for him a long and distinguished career in congress.

Moorhead News: The Clay County delegation to the St. Cloud convention speak in the highest terms of praise of the conduct of and efficient work done by the Polk, Becker, Wilkin, Kittson and Marshall County delegates in securing the nomination of Mr. Comstock. They were as enthusiastic, continuous and unfaltering as the home delegation, and was owing to their unflinching and sturdy loyalty that other delegates were slowly but surely attracted and won over to the Moorhead candidate.

Moorhead News: Messrs. A. A. White, H. A. Bruns, ohn Erickson, W. J. Bodkin, C. A. Nye, L. Osborn and G. S. Barnes, and the four delegates, are standing by Mr. Comstock with firmness, and if it is possible by continuous work and staying qualities, he will be nominated. The Polk County delegation have been just as true and unfaltering, and to this body of eight men Mr. Comstock will owe a debt of political gratitude whether he be nominated or not. Becker, Wilkin and Kittson, after the latter swung around, have been just as true and unwavering.

Pioneer-Express, Pembina, D. T.: The Fifth district republicans have nominated S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, for congress. As his election is assured, the Red River Valley can now congratulate herself on the prospect of having an able representative in Congress who has a vote; for Mr. Comstock's interests are nearly equally divided by the Red River, and he is well and favorably known by thousands of our Dakota people.

Plaindealer, Grand Forks, D. T: The nomination of S. G. Comstock of Moorhead as Nelson's successor in the Fifth District in Minnesota will be pleasant news to Mr. Comstocks's thousands of Dakota friends. He is well worthy of the honor.

Herald, Grand Forks, D. T.: Hon. S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, Minn., was nominated for congress yesterday, by the republicans of the Fifth district, to succeed Hon. Knute Nelson. The nomination is an excelent one. Mr. Comstock is a worthy and able man, of unimpeachable integrity, and has had varied legislative experience in both houses of the Minnesota legislature. As he has lived in this district for over fifteen years, there is no man in it so well acquainted with its great resources and its legislative needs. Mr. Comstock is sure of an election, and is sure to make a good record.

Brainerd Tribune: S. G. Comstock, of Clay County, carried off the congressional plum at the St. Cloud republican convention. The convestion met on Tuesday, and had taken the twenty-fourth ballot at 10 p. m., when an adjournment was had until the next morning at 9 o'clock. The twenty-four ballots did not differ materially from the first taken, the friends of each of the five candidates holding solidly to their favorites. The dead-lock was not broken until late Wednesday afternoon. During the afternoon Mr. Comstock gained steadily and was finally nominated on the forty-fifth ballot.

The nominee of the convention was born in Argyle, Me., forty-six years ago, and came to Minnesota in 1870 and began the practice of law at Moorhead. He was County Attorney of Clay County for three terms, has served in the House and Senate of Minnesota for ten years, and is now a State Senator. He is said to be a man of undoubted ability, a persistent and hard worker, and has been very successful in business. He is personally popular, and will no doubt prove an able, active and zealous representative of the great Fifth Minnesota district.

Hon. Knute Nelson Pleased With the St. Cloud Selection.

Comstock His Personal Choice as a Worthy Successor.

NOT UNKOWN TO KNUTE.

Congressman Nelson Pleased at the Choice For His Successor.

[Special Dispatch to the Minneapolis Tribune.]

Washington, D. C., June 13.—Hon. Knute Nelson was seen this evening by the Tribune reporter and asked if he had heard of the nomination of Mr. Comstock in the Fifth district.

"I have," he replied, "and have just sat down to wire him my congratulations."

"How does it strike you?"

"As one of the best that could have been made. There is no reason for any dissatisfaction over the result and there will no doubt be none. He can poll the full strength of the party. He is an able and first-class man in every respect and I can safely predict that he will make his mark in Congress, both as a debater and in influencing legislation."

"Had you any preference among the candidates?"

"Barto, Comstock and Graves were among my leading friends in the famous Detroit convention, and while I felt friendly to all the candidates, my heart naturally went out most warmly to these three I could have cheerfully endorsed and supported either."

"Then you think the convention made no mistake?"

"None at all. On the contrary, it could not have done better. I am highly gratified with the nomination and will add that while all the candidates were good men and would have served their constituents with credit, if I could have had my wish gratified, if I could have named the nominee, Comstock, the next representative from my district, would have been the man."

Mr. Nelson was in the best of humor and gave no evidence of soreness. In fact, the words "delighted with the situation" express the whole thing relative to Comstock's nomination. About matters connected with his own service, he said he had succeded in getting more bills through this session by unanimous consent than almost any member, but he has now the right of way bills and three or four other bills which he is watching for an opportunity to bring up and get action upon. It is difficult to anticipate what will be the result, as any crank can jump up and object and that kills the effort for the time being. "Unanimous consent," in the present temper of the majority, is impossible to obtain. But Nelson's pluck, skill and perseverence will overcome this legislative obstacle if any man's can, and matter in his hands of interest to the Northwest will be favorably disposed of.

Going West.

The general interest that has been taken in the opening of the Montana Indian Reservations is shown by the large numbers of people who have already gone to Great Falls to investigate the mineral and agricultural resources of that wonderful country. The low excursion rate announced by C. H. Warren, Gen. Pass. Agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, makes the expense of exploring this country merely nominal, and will undoubtedly result in a still larger number following. [4-11]

But very few people are aware of the amount of adulteration there is in the different lines of food products. Sugars, jellies, butter and cheese are all liable to adulteration when brought from eastern markets. When in want of a pure article of cheese, call on Hartshorn, Hurlbut & Co. or B. Clements and ask for Hallock cheese which is warranted absolutely pure and full cream-stock. By so doing you secure a good article while you encourage home manufacture.

Give the Farm the Proper Credits.

Breeders' Gazette.

We have a friend who is anxious to sell his farm, which he regards as worth $16,000, "because it does not pay," and put his capital at interest. Probably he worst calamity which could befall him would be that he should find a customer. Seven per cent, is certainly as high interest as he can depend upon, and even if none of his capital is at any time idle, his gross receipts will only be $1,120, and taxes will reduce that by at least $200, leaving $920. He will have to provide himself with a house to live in, and $20 per month—$240 per year—will not secure as good a one as he has on the farm, so that there remains but $680 per year with which to face the world and support the family. And after these expenses have been met it is pretty certain there will not be much "pay" left. Now the farm will undoubtedly do a great deal better than this. Without realizing it or giving the farm proper credit for it the farmer draws his principal support from the farm. It furnishes the vegetables, the fruits, the milk and butter, the poultry, eggs, etc., consumed by the family, and probably part of the fresh and al the salt meats. Only those who run to the butchers two or three times a day and buy their potatoes by the pound and their milk by the pint realize what all these things cost, and what a sum of money they will absorb in the course of a year. They embrace, in fact, as any one who is under the necessity of purchasing everything knows full well, the principal part of the expense of living. All these things the farmer has in profusion to start with, and they constitute a very considerable proportion of what should be expected from a moderate-sized farm. But many are unmindful of this fact, and are dissatisfied with the farm because it does not pay a large sum of money over and above support. It pays something beyond this point, which is probably more than could be realized from the same capital otherwise invested, and if provided with better stock and given the advantage of more care and study, there are few farms which cannot be made to pay a great deal better than they are now doing under the management of dissatisfied owners who are looking for a chance to sell.

If the farmer expects to embark his capital in trade, he is venturing upon lines entirely new to his experience, in which competition is very close and often ruinous, and where the ground is more than well occupied already by men trained in business and alert to perceive and avail themselves of every advantage. Perhaps the farmer will succeed here, were trained and experienced men can make but little and often ignominiously fail, but the chances are that he will lose instead of gain, and will be found a few years hence striving with diminished capital and greater disadvantages to re-establish himself in farming which he had no business to have abandoned.

The fact is, farmers have no occasion to be dissatisfied with their condition. They are better off and doing better as a class than any other class of business men in the community. The farm pays them more, all things considered, than they would likely realize from the same capital otherwise employed. They should understand this and be satisfied with it. And if the farm does not pay what it should pay, give to the details of its management some of that patient and persistent attention and study which is essential to success in general trade, and make it pay better. Procure improved stock, make its management and feeding a matter of constant reading and investigation, and by better methods and better farming give the farm a better chance, and it will tell a better story.

MONTANA SHORT LINE.

When traveling every one should consider well the questions of economy, comfort, safety and speed, these questions being of the same importance in a journey of an hour as in one of several days' ride. An examination of the map will convince anyone that this is the most direct route to and from all the principal points in Central and Northern Minnesota, Dakota and Montana. Our equipment and time are excellent. Our rates are the lowest, but this fact is something which speaks for itself. Definite figures and maps can be obtained by applying to any Agent of the Company, or the General Passenger Agent.

Letter from W. H. Jennings.

Tacoma, June 11, 1888.

I left Crookston May 30th, at 10 a. m., via the St. P., M. & M. R. R. and C. P. R. R. Contrary to my expectations, I had to stop over in Winnipeg the first night on account of the Manitoba and Canada Pacific roads not making connections. The Manitoba train arrives in Winnipeg at 5:25 p. m. and the Canada Pacific train leaves at 10.25 a. m., thereby compelling all through passengers to stop over in Winnipeg. This is an additional expense and loss of time. This same thing occurs nearly every day at Vancouver, and is very unpleasant, expensive and a loss of three days time, which does not occur on the N. P. R. R. I would advise those going to the Pacific coast to take the Northern Pacific if they value time and money. I have somewhat digressed from the intent of my letter, but I felt so much like a "kicker" all the way through (and there was plenty more of the same kind) that I did not go by the Northern Pacific.

I found Winnipeg very much improved since I was last there in 1885. It has put on Metropolitan airs, with all the modern architecture and improvements. Large brick buildings have taken the place of the old wooden structures that were there in '85: still, with all the improvements and rapid growth of their cities, I have no love for that side of the line. As a young man remarked, as we went through Portage La Prairie: "The stars and stripes are good enough for me!" and I shall always feel that the same are my sentiments. The country from Winnipeg to Portage La Prairie and Brandon is much the same as the Red River Valley, and vast prairies of rich, fertile land, much of the way, were well settled, and the finely improved farms had the appearance of an old settled country. After leaving Brandon the country is more sparsely settled and less fertile land. From Regina to Medicine Hat is what might be called the "Bad Lands." There is, seemingly, no fertility to the soil, nor can it hardly be called soil, as it is a yellow sand with no grass growing on it, but now and then bunches of cactus and short weeds are to be seen. The ground, in many places was white with alkali. In some of the low places where the water had evaporated, it had the appearance of a heavy fall of snow. There has been no rain to speak of in Manitoba this spring. The weather being extremely cold and windy, with the dust blowing in clouds, it made our journey very disagreeable. To relieve the monotony of the scene from our car window, an antelope would occasionally go speeding across the vast and limitless prairies, seemingly with no particular point in view, but simply to "catch on," the same as we were doing "in our mind." Foxes and prairie dogs would appear by the side of the track and the passengers would amuse themselves by shooting their revolvers at them. If I was as near making a fortune as they were in hitting the foxes, I should consider my chances desperate.

After leaving Medicine Hat we were all anticipating the foot hills that lead to the mountains, but we were sadly disappointed, as the darkness set in while we were yet on the boundless prairie, so we took to our blankets on a slat bed in the second class sleeper, (which, by the way, was very comfortable,) and when we awoke at daylight we were among the snow-clad mountains, the first that I had ever seen, and from this time on till we reached our destination, we did not lack for something interesting, beautiful and grand beyond any description I could give. The high mountain peaks, that extended heavenward, covered with snow, while the sun shone on it, glistened like silver sheen. The massive rocks thrown into the depths below, showing some great convulsion of nature, making the scenery grand to behold. The railroad wound its way up between the mountains and beside the streams that went rushing and tearing down the mountain side. The snow melting on the mountain tops formed small streams which plunged down its sides, making cascades and waterfalls that were beautiful indeed. The water dashing and tearing over the rocks would form into bubbles and spray, turning it white, as though the milk maid had spilt all the milk she had gathered for years and it was running down the mountains and over the rocks. As we approached the summit the streams grew less in size until it was simply the melted snow gathered into pools and prepared to take a leap down the mountain side, tearing, leaping, jumping from precipice to precipice down the mountain to the sea. At the highest point, or where the descent commences for the western slope, we took breakfast at the Pacific Hotel. The breakfast was excellent, which strengthened our nerves to stand passing down through the infernal regions, as we may well call them. The first few miles we went down like a shot, as though the engineer had lost control of the machine he handled, and we were going to destruction. The little stream that started with us from the mountain top, at the distance of a mile, was a creek, two miles, a large stream, and three, a tearing river. Our train wound round the mountain side, here and there, in and out, and across the river at almost every turn.

The mountain sides were covered with rocks and bowlders standing and pointing in every direction. It looked as though the D—l had shot his big gun at the mountain for a mark, and did not pick up the shell. The pine or fir trees here, were not very thrifty. In this we were much disappointed, as we had expected a much larger growth, though as we neared the coast, they increased in size very materially. On the west side of the Rockies the scenery is said to be grand. We are not able to verify the statement, by observation, as we were asleep. Going up the eastern slope, however, it surpassed anything we ever saw; some of the time curving around the center of the mountain with immense height above and a great abyss below, then through tunnels in the rock, hundreds of feet long. We had to pass under thirteen miles of snow sheds. These were not exactly to our liking, as they prevented observation of the beautiful scenery and we did not care to lose any of it although the sheds are of great value in winter to prevent the snow avalanches from blockading the road. The next point of interest was the Glacier Hotel, built by the C. P. Co. for an eating house and summer resort, situated in a gulch between two mountains which are continually covered with snow having the appearance of being many feet deep. Pleasure seekers would find plenty of exercise in climbing the mountains and, in fact, they would have little chance to walk without climbing. About three miles below the hotel is what is called the Great Loop where the track has to wind round the base of the mountain or basin, return and pass over the track we had just been over, forming a loop to get down the descent. We were whirled round this loop and down, down to Albert Canon where the train pulled up for the accomodation of the lovers of grandeur to view this fearful abyss, a narrow gorge down some hundreds of feet with a stream of water dashing and tearing through between the rocks. It was certainly grand and beyond my pen to describe. Soon after leaving this point, we crossed the Columbia River when darkness set in, and shut off our day's pleasure of sight seeing. At daylight the next morning we found ourselves winding along the banks of the Thompson River. This stream is large and very rapid passing through rocks and gorges between the mountains, some places being very narrow causing the water in its descent to force its way through, to foam and boil like a seething caldron of Sheol. The balance of the way to Victoria, the scenery was varied and wonderful. Now and then an Indian hamlet that looked squalid and uninteresting; these people are mostly Catholics we should judge from the crosses in the graveyards and on the churches. On arriving at Victoria at 1:30 p. m. Sunday, the first greeting we got was by the Salvation Army with fife, drum and tamborine. They tumble in front of the hotel and prayed for souls. How they knew we were going to Tacoma, we have not found out. We took in as much of Vancouver as possible during the p. m. and next morning before the boat left at 1:30 p. m. when we took passage on the Premier for Seattle and Tacoma. The boat was all night and until 9:30 in the morning, on the Sound, before she pulled in at Seattle. We had three hours here and we assure you we made the most of them. We cannot say that we were pleased with the location, though the place was all business, judging from the number of people on the streets though the most of them seemed to be strangers like myself. The city is located on the hills, with narrow streets butting against each other. I walked up and down until exhausted, then returned to the boat and wished to be dropped in the land of the Tacomas, where we arrived at 5:30 p. m. We found Tacoma much pleasanter than we expected, therefore, were agreeably disappointed. The city is pleasantly situated on the bay with sufficient elevation to overlook the sound and surrounding country. The streets are wide and pleasant. The principle business thoroughfares running north and south with a slight descent. Those running east and west are much steeper and it is somewhat tiresome to walk up and down in that direction. There are many elegant residences and business blocks in the suburbs, a mile or two out, the ground is covered with stumps and stubs the roots being as large as an ordinary Minnesota tree. Mount Tacoma, seventy miles to the southeast, looms up with its magnificent snow-clad top, and still seems so near that you could reach it with a ten-foot pole. The streets and hotels are crowded with people from nearly every state in the Union, some looking for labor, some for speculation, some for pleasure. Those who came here without means expecting to get work at big prices, will get left, as there are too many of that class here; but those who have means can use it to advantage either in business or real estate. The main business interest is lumber. Farming and fruit raising are profitable if one has the patience to clear the land, as it is very rich.

I have seen strawberries nearly as large as hen's eggs. The cherries are more like the old Virginia fruit than any I have seen elsewhere. I am located and expect to remain. Wm. Ross and Wm. Box are still looking over the ground with good prospects in view. H. M. Pierce is located near Olympia. I have not yet seen Mr. Perry who is on Vaschon Island.

A Question of Health.

What Baking Powder Shall We Use?

This plain question comes home to every house keeper. We all desire pure and wholesome food, and this cannot be had with the use of impure or poisonous baking powder. There can be no longer a question that all the cheaper, lower grades of baking powders contain either alum, lime or phosphatic acid. As loath as we may be to admit so much against what may have been some of our household gods, there can be no gainsaying the unanimous testimony of the official chemists. Indeed, analysts seem to find no baking powder entirely free from some one of these objectionable ingredients except the Royal, and that they report as chemically pure. We find some of the baking powders advertised as pure, to contain, under the tests of Professors Chandler, Habirshaw and others, nearly twelve per cent. of lime, while others are made from alum with no cream of tartar. This, we presume, accounts for their leavening power as somtimes complained of by the cook, and for the bitter taste found in the biscuits so frequently complained of by ourselves.

But aside from the inferiority of the work done by these powders, the physicians assure us that lime and alum taken into the system in such quantities as this are injurious. Their physiological effects are indigestion, dyspepsia, or worse evils.

The question naturally arises, why do these cheap baking powder makers use these things? Alum is three cents a pound, lime still cheaper, while cream of tartar costs thirty-five or forty. The reasons for the chemical purity of the Royal Baking Powder were recently given in the New York Times in an interesting description of a new method for refining argols, or crude cream of tartar. It seems that it is only under this process that cream of tartar can be freed from the lime natural to it and rendered chemically pure; that the patents and plant for this cost the Royal Baking Powder Company about half a million dollars, and that they maintain exclusive control of the rights.

Professor McMurtrie, late chief chemist of the Department of Agriculture, at Washington, D. C., made an examination of this process, and reported upon the results attained in the refined cream of tartar. The following extract from his report would seem to answer the question repeated at the head of this article, and which is so frequently propounded by the housekeeper:

"I have examined the cream of tartar used by the Royal Baking Powder Company in the manufacture of their baking powder, and find it to be perfectly pure and free from lime in any form. The chemical tests to which I have submitted the Royal Baking Powder prove it perfectly healthful and free from every deleterious substance. The Royal Baking Powder is purest in quality and highest in strength of any baking powder of which I have knowledge."

Comstock Nominated.

Douglas County News.

The Republican Congressional Convention held at St. Cloud on the 12th and 13th of June nominated Solomon G. Comstock of Moorhead to succeed the Hon. Knute Nelson as member of Congress from the Fifth District of Minnesota.

The ninety-nine delegates attending the convention were nearly evenly divided between ex-Lieutenant Gov. Barto, of Sauk Centre, Judge Stearns, of Duluth, Senator Buckman, of Sauk Rapids, Solomon G. Comstock, of Moorhead, and E. E. Corlis, of Fergus Falls. The convention was composed of thoroughly representative men and was remarkable for the harmony and good feeling which prevailed throughout all its proceedings. Forty-five ballots were necessary to concentrate upon one candidate the fifty votes required to effect the nomination. All the defeated condidates accepted the situation in a graceful and manly way, and signified their intention of getting revenge on Mr. Comstock next November by "rolling up" for him unprecedented Republican majorities in their respective localities.

The choice of nearly every Republican of Douglas County, was undoubtedly ex-Lieutenant Gov. Barto with Comstock as second choice; throughout thirty-eight ballots the Douglas County delegates labored zealously for Barto's nomination. During the progress of the convention, at the close of the first day thereof, two of the Douglas County delegates, namely, C. J. Gunderson of Alexandria and W. P. Long of Osakis, both staunch Barto men were obliged to leave the convention owing to previous business engagements. On the thirty-ninth ballot the remaining delegates cast the vote of the delegation for Comstock. This was the turning point in the contest as soon thereafter Buckman's supporters came over to Comstock and effected the nomination. On the forty-fifth and last ballot Comstock received fifty votes (the number required to nominate,) Barto 19, Corliss 15, Graves 14 and Stearns 1.

The Republicans of the Fifth District are to be heartily congratulated upon this happy outcome of the St. Cloud convention. For the five years last past the district has been represented in congress by a man whose ceaseless energy, sound judgment, progressive ideas and loyal devotion to the interests of his constituents have gained for him a national reputation. Tariff Reform, Inter State Commerce, and the Civil Service are some of the leading questions upon which the people are thinking vigorously to-day. Mr. Nelson has defined his position upon these subjects in no uncertain terms, and it is of the utmost importance that his successor should maintain the position taken by him on these subjects and carry on the work so nobly begun.

We believe that Mr. Comstock is a worthy and fit successor of Knute Nelson. For many years Mr. Comstock has been his warm friend and supporter He is an able lawyer and experienced legislator, having during a period of ten years been a member of the legislature of Minnesota. A life long Republican and thoroughly in harmony with the progressive ideas of the Republican party. In the prime of life, being forty-six years of age. Thoroughly honest, beloved and respected by all who know him.

The Republicans of the Fifth District are thoroughly united on Mr. Comstock's candidacy will not only solidify and strengthen the party, eliminating therefrom the feuds and bitterness of the past, but it will draw to its support many persons who believe in clean politics, irrespective of party affiliation.

We ask the Republicans of the First, Third and Fourth Congressional Districts of Minnesota to profit by the by the experience of the St. Cloud convention. Factional strife, personal jealousy and hatred between the Republican leaders in these districts have deprived the party of the representatives to whom they are justly entitled. Let the Republican conventions which shall soon assemble in these districts choose clean, able and progressive men whose candidacies emanate from the people, and let the progressive element of the Republican party share in the counsels of the party and help to shape its destiny, and Minnesota will once more present an unbroken Republican front in the national legislature.

Gilman Falsely Accused.

Duluth Daily Tribune.

The St. Paul Dispatch and some other papers interested in booming one or the other of the St. Paul candidates for Governor, are endeavoring just now, to create a huge sensation by charging that C. A. Gilman betrayed and sold out Gov. Barto in the late congressional convention. The Dispatch publishes a stunning communication with three-fourths of a column of head-lines, purporting to have been written at St. Cloud, in which this charge is distinctly made, and in which it predicted that the discovery of Mr. Gilman's alleged double-dealing with Barto will be his (Gilman's) political death knell This is a very nicely gotten up story, and if true, it might injuriously affect the political interests of Mr, Gilman with the people of this district; but we are well convinced that there is not a word of truth in it from the beginning to the end, and that it was manufactured out of whole cloth in the vain hope of injuring Mr. Gilman's chances for governor. The St. Cloud convention would have resulted just as it did, even if Mr. Gilman on that day had been on the opposite side of the earth. Any one with half one eye, who attended the convention readily saw, after a few hours' observation, that Mr. Comstock's chances were far superior to those of Mr. Barto from the very start. Mr. Barto is a gentleman, towards whom the republicans of the district feel most kindly and by his steady and persistent work for the past several months, he had in his own and some of the neighboring counties, worked up quite a respectable following for himself, but not enough to do him any good. He had twenty-six delegates committed to him and who did all they could to secure his nomination, but alas for his chances, twenty-four more votes were required to secure the coveted honor. Of course the needed votes he could only obtain by being the second choice of that many delegates. Now, a careful canvas of the situation on Tuesday night revealed the fact that his entire possible strength in the convention consisted of the twenty-six delegates which he by persistent button-holing had secured in the counties referred to above. He was their first choice, but hardly a delegate could be found who would admit he was his second choice; while many could readily be found who were free to state their second choice was Mr. Comstock. This, they did of their own volition and free choice, and Mr Gilman did not influence them, nor attempt to influence them in the matter. The writer of this article was present at that convention and knows whereof he affirms in regard to this affair.

Why, then, was this ingenious cock and bull story gotten up at this time and such a great spread made over it? The answer is easily given. While Mr. Gilman has not announced himself as a candidate for governor, the other aspirants for that position, fear that he will do so, and they know very well that he has about as many friends as any of them and that in the famous fighting Fifth in particular, he has more friends than the whole of them combined. They regarded it, therefore, as "good politics" to try to weaken him in what is known to be his stronghold, and they hoped to alienate from him the friends of Gov. Barto by the vigorous circulation of the story that he sold Barto out at the St. Cloud convention. We give Gov. Barto and his particular friends, however, too much credit for good hard sense to suppose that they will be bamboozled by any such nonsense.

One little circumstance which occurred at St. Cloud will clearly illustrate the force of what we have just said as to the motive of the above canard: On the morning of the convention, we met at that place a gentleman who was not a delegate, but who is well known to be the campaign manager of one of the other candidates for governor. When asked "how the land lay" and "for which of the congressional candidates he was interesting himself," he replied that after a careful canvas among the delegates, he was satisfied that Barto could not be nominated for the reason that he was not the second choice of enough of the delegates to enable him to win. The speaker added that he was not taking a part for or against either of the other candidates, but what he was looking after was the gubernatoral matter; that while Charley Gilman had not announced himself as a candidate for governor, yet he was very likely to do so, and if he should he would have a large following, but that if, after expressing himself as favorable to Barto, the latter should be defeated, they then proposed to claim that Gilman had sold him out, and work that racket against Gilman for all that it was worth; and it will be seen that friends of a rival candidate, or rival candidates, for governor, are now trying to see what capital they can make against Mr. Gilman by alleging that he is responsible for Mr. Barto's defeat.

As above stated, we do not think that there are very many republicans among the friends of Gov. Barto, who will be silly enough to believe that Mr. Gilman conspired against Gov. Barto's nomination. As to those persons who are claiming that the publication of the story above alluded to will be Charley Gilman's "political death knell," we would not advise them to bank very heavily on that idea. The Philistines in campaigns gone by have gotten up many a fine story which was intended to "down Charley Gilman," but none of them had the desired effect and it is not at all probable that this last one, the most absurd of all, will be any more successful. This is a free country and Mr. Gilman has the right to be a candidate for governor, if he choose. As to whether he shall so choose will probably depend somewhat upon the nature of the efforts of those candidates already in the field to keep him off the track.

Personally we feel most kindly toward the candidate whose "manager" disclosed to us this scheme to injure Mr. Gilman; but as we believe in fairness in politics, and in the candidates all being allowed to run on their own merits, we consider that simple justice to Mr. Gilman demands the publication of the above statement.

The rapid growth of the art sentiment in the Northwest and the fact that its citizens have become liberal buyers of fine paintings is attracting much attention in the East, and artists of the first-class, who, three years ago refused to send their pictures to the Minneapolis Exposition are now willing and anxious to do so as sale is almost certain if the paintings are sufficiently meritous. Messrs. Hill, Marmheimes and Merriam of St. Paul, and Lowry, Walker and Pillsbury of Minneapolis have large galleries, while the number of smaller collections in the twin cities and the smaller cities of the Northwest. The Superintendent of the Exposition Art Gallery has spent nearly the entire winter among studios of the artists in the East and South and has promises of the finest collection ever shown in the country. The general manager has a letter from Wm. Bradford the celebrated painter of artistic scenery in which "Mr. Smith has certainly secured the finest lot of pictures ever gotten together in this country. It will far surpass the Academy collection, for he has the gems from that as well as from that as well as from all the other exhibitions." The Art Gallery will certainly be a great feature of the next Exposition.

The American Agriculturist for July, 1888, abounds in readable articles. A "Midsummer" sketch is the frontispiece, and is all aglow with the brightness and warmth of the season. The illustrations are abundant and good: a typical Sussex cow, a pair of Houdans, a couple of characteristic Merinos, the Chinch bug, a Kentucky Road Horse, a group of dogs, and various buildings and farm and household appliances and decorations being among the number. Seth Green writes of the kinds of fish for ponds and points out the natural habitat of fish in bodies of water. Miss Morgan offers some hints for the care of farm horses. Joseph Harris discourses of cabbage culture and predicts that this vegetable will become a farm crop. Mrs. Ward of Dakota explains how her farm buildings and animals escaped the devastation wrought by the Januryy blizzard and gives some valuable points in regard to tree planting as a protection from storms. Geo. A. Martin writes of the Sussex Cattle and the American Merinos, A Suburban Cottage costing $3,500 is figured and described. Dr. Chase has an article on Swine and A. H. Duff one on Bee-hives. Prof. Reasoner encourages Aloe Culture in Florida. Miss E. K. Winans has a picturesque article on the mental and moral peculiarities of the Houdan fowl. Mr. Tarr sketches the ways of the ancient farmers of our prehistoric age. S. Hollister advises double cropping as a means of doubling profits. The latest news from the Chinch bug is written up. A notable Kentucky road stallion is treated in a brief biography, Mr. Willis continues his scientific disquisitions on wheat. There is much to interest the ladies and children in the the Household Department and in the story columns. The Basket is packed with interesting information. Altogether the number is full of instruction, and maintains the well assured character of this long-established journal. Price $1.50 per year, English or German. Subscriptions may begin with any month. Single copies 15 cents. Address American Agriculturist, 751 Broadway, New York.

Fergus Falls Journal: The universal tone of cordiality with which the nomination of Comstock is hailed throughout the district is a splendid testimonial to his high character and ability, and a harbinger of the large majority which he will receive next November.

The democrats begin to weaken. Already we see indications of many new recruits in the republican ranks.

Barret & Asseline are raising the roof to their store building to make more room for their growing business.

C. C. Knappen and lady, Fisher Bulletin, listened to the "Queena" of Miss Edith Arnold on Monday evening.

J. N. Bailey returned on Saturday's train, from a trip to Glenwood and reports crops well advanced in that vicinity.

The democrats are in a terrible flutter over the congressional nomination. It is because they know they cannot beat our nominee.

Rev. Charles Carroll has gone East for his family, having accepted a call to the Baptist Church. It is hoped he will return before next Sabbath.

The race cource east of town is the scene of much hard work by such members of the sporting fraternity as hope to gain honors on the Fourth.

P. C. Schmidt feels as happy as a big sun-flower all on ascount of the arrival of a little miss at his home, who will in time learn to call him papa.

P. J. McGuire and family left on Friday evening for a visit to the old home in Wright Co. They expect to be gone a week or ten days.

Prof. Tom Casey was visiting in the city last week' The Prof. has secured the Fisher school at a salary of $900 and will commence his labors about Sept. 1st. Fisher is to be congratulated on its choice.

Mrs. E. E. Perry, with her daughters, Miss Nellie and little Gracie, departed on Thursday last for their new home at Tacoma, accompanied by the best wishes of hosts of friends.

That big banner across Robert, bearing the legend "Harrison and Morton" fills the heart of the loyal republican with hope and that of the average democrat with gloom. It is the winning card for '88 and don't you forget it!

Clark Van Housen, our former deputy register of deeds arrived in the city on Thursday last for a business visit of a week or ten days duration. Clark is the picture of health and happiness and reports a thriving business in Elgin, Ills.

On Tuesday, June 19th Mr. and Mrs. Judd G. Stearns welcomed the arrival of a son and heir. On Thursday the little one sickened and died leaving the young parents to mourn its untimely end. The sorrowing relatives have the earnest sympathy of hosts of friends.

Chris. Houston reports the sale of his Star Bashaw trotter to John Jenkins, of Northcote, for $250 cash. The colt is two years old and a rustler. Chris says raising colts beats wheat clear out of sight and he is right providing the right kind of colts are raised.

If you neglect the opportunity to secure a fine building property that will be presented next Saturday you will miss the event of a life time. Remember there is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at the flood leads on to fortune, neglected you will kick yourself forever after and wonder why you did not tumble. Go and see what you can do.

The body of Jas. Clark, who was drowned on Sunday, June 17th at East Grand Forks was found on Wednesday June 20th. Coroner Shepard was notified and at once repaired to the scene. The jury found that the deceased came to his death by drowning as the result of his fool-hardy attempt to swim the river and coroner Shepard hired an undertaker of Grand Forks to bury the body which was in a fearful state of decomposition.

A number of the members of Constantine Commandery joined the excursion to Winnipeg last week returning on Monday. A number of the members of the Fargo Commandery were on board. Upon arrival of the train the two companies filed out on the depot platform and favored the multitude with several songs, sung as only those boys know how to sing them. As the home company left the platform the Fargo boys gave them: "For they are jolly good fellows" and "So say we all of us." The boys report having had a grand good time.

On Wednesday and Thursday of last week occurred in Grand Forks an event of great importance to this country, where a large number of thoroughbred cattle and horses were offered for sale. We are pleased to notice that many of the animals offered were secured by farmers in this country, some of them coming into Polk County. Among these we notice that D. McMillan, of Edna, bought "Sir Christis Kirk," No. 4266, a descendant of the noted Netherland family of Holstein-Friesians, one of the best butter families of the breed. C. H. Bruce bought the Holstein-Friesian bull calf "Grand Forks." This calf is also a descendant of the Netherlands, its grandsire being the famous prize-winner, Constantyn. We are glad to see these grand animals brought to Polk County as it augurs will for the dairy future of the county. Farmers are beginning to see that in the Holstein-Friesian breed lies the profit of cattle raising in this county and they are on the right track at last. The result will be a grand dairy county in the near future.

It looks as if every one was planning a holiday on the 4th of July. The low rates announced by the St. P., M. & M. Ry. will influence a great deal of travel.

The inevitable man and bear show appeared upon our streets on Tuesday evening to the great delight of juvenile Crookston. Every urchin within a radius of ten miles seemed to have caught on and his bearship had a large retinue whenever he appeared in public.

Ed. M. Peterson was in the city this week. Hereafter he will make his home near Fosston, in the Thirteen. He reports the death of Erick Erickson, who died of pneumonia after an illness of only five days. Mr. E. was an old and highly respected citizen of the Thirteen Towns.

The Clair Patee Company presented "Queena" on Monday evening with Miss Edith Arnold in the title role. Miss Arnold is a strong emotional actress of great power. Willard Simms is strong in comedy as also is Miss Mai Maysil. The company as a whole is a strong one, deserving of a liberal patronage.

Save your money, take a holiday and visit your friends on the 4th of July. The Manitoba road makes a rate of one and one-third fares for round trips in Minnesota, or for interstate trips between Minnesota and Dakota, and one fare for round trip locally in Dakota and Montana. No tickets being sold at these rates, however, for a greater distance than three hundred miles Tickets will be sold July 2d, 3d and 4th, good returning till 5th, inclusive.

Caleb B. Palmer arrived this week looking as bright as a new dollar. C. B. says Harrison and Morton are the winners, "sure." He informs us that Crookston is the liveliest place for business he has seen since he left here last fall and when we get an idea that times are dull here we ought to travel about a little and see what dull times are.

The republican club met last Thursday evening and decided to hold a ratification meeting on the evening of Monday, July 16th when a rousing old time is expected. A number of celebrated speakers from abroad are expected and the Hon. S. G. Comstock has been invited and is confidently expected to be present. All are invited to attend.

Prof. C. O. Blanchard took his departure on Monday evening for Barnesville where he intends to organize a class in penmanship. The Professor graduated under Prof. M. U. Squire with high honors standing one of the best if not the very best in the school. Prof. Squire pronounces him thoroughly competent to teach penmanship in all its branches and THE JOURNAL unites with his many friends in the wish for his abundant success.

Chas. Jefferson and wife, a week or so since, started for a visit to friends in Wisconsin. They had scarcely reached Minneapolis when a telegram reached them with information that their little girl had been taken very sick. As their whereabouts in Minneapolis were unknown it took some time to find them so that several days elapsed before their return. They found the little one very much better and nearly out of danger and she has now entirely recovered.

Fourth of July excursion rates will be put into effect, as usual, this season, and all having the time to take a holiday should avail themselves of the low rates offered by the Manitoba road.

Upon receipt of the telegram announcing the nomination of Ben Harrison the city went wild with enthusiasm and, later in the evening, when the announcement was made that Morton supplements the ticket the enthusiasm was boundless and bonfires, fireworks and general rejoicing were the order of the evening, continued until a late hour. The contrast between this event and the receipt of the news of the nomination of Cleveland and Thurman was striking and significant. Cleveland's nomination was so much of a foregone conclusion that no room for enthusiasm was left and none was felt. It is the opinion of all that the republican ticket is the strongest that could be made and it makes the average democrat very uncomfortable.

Joe Mathews has fixed the stage up in fine shape. He is determined that if the opera house does not suit hereafter it will be no fault of his.

The Patee Company presented "An Evening Out" on Tuesday evening to a better house than greeted their first appearance in this city. This is one of the best troupes that ever visited our city.

Comrade John Wright was up from Ada on Tuesday. He is of the opinion that Grover will get very little help from the Grand Army boys this fall. He thinks we have had enough of that to suit any reasonable man. John says he likes a good thing but he knows when he has had enough.

About 8 o'clock Tuesday evening Mr. Fontaine was seen to emerge from Cowing's hardware store and run rapidly up Main street, holding in an affectionate manner a Winchester repeating rifle, "loaded," (as Pollard said,) "to the muzzle." A few hurried questions disclosed to the wondering citizens the fact that the party who committed the robbery in Fontaine & Anglim's clothing store on the night of the 10th inst. was concealed in the woods west of the city. This intelligence created intense excitement, and men swarmed, like bees, to the scene. The larger part of the crowd had scarcely reached the bridge at Darco's slough, however, before a man mounted on a pony dashed up and shouted to Hayes, "He's swum the river!" and all hands returned to find officer McDonald and Fred Hall in possession of the house of one John Maxwell, situated about one block northwest of the brewery. Here the crowd learned the following facts, told with the usual embellishments: Immediately after the robbery, Chief Hayes notified responsible persons in all towns in the vicinity to be on the lookout for suspicious characters. On Tuesday evening at 5 o'clock, Fontaine & Anglim received a telegram from Angus stating that a man who had been peddling clothing there, had boarded the train going south and Mr. McDonald and Hall were at the depot ready to receive him. He did not appear, but it was learned that a party having a large pack, had jumped from the train at the junction, and Hall started at once for that place, where he found a large pack secreted beneath a culvert, the contents of which were identified as some of the stolen stock. From some boys, it was learned that a party coming from the junction, had watched Fred from the Seventh St. bridge, and seeing McDonald and Fountaine drive out in a buggy, had made for the woods. Hayes, with a number of deputies went out, saw the thief, and himself gave chase, but Maxwell, for he it was, had a good start and made his escape, swimming Darcow's Slough. Making his way to the river, he divested himself of his coat and vest (which are now in the possession of Fountaine and Anglim) and removing his shoes, carried them with him, slung over his neck, he crossed the river and was seen no more. In the meantime, Maxwell's residence was guarded by Al. Jones and J. W. Benoit, special police appointed by McDonald. Several imprudent remarks as well as evident uneasiness on the part of Mrs. Maxwell cast such a suspicion upon her that Hayes thought best to lock her up for the night. Upon leaving her house, she took from the wall a skirt in the folds of which was concealed the coat of a $37 suit, such as Fountaine & Anglim have in stock; she was also seen to burn the contents of an envelope, the superscription of which was identical with penmanship found in a pocket of the coat left on the river bank by Maxwell. The police think several crooks about town are implicated, and every effort is being made to secure the guilty parties.

Nearly a Bad Accident.

On Monday afternoon Mr. Nap, Rapin's little children stood on the crossing of Robert, near Fred Anderson's, waiting for a team to pass when a horse, that had been running about the streets loose for an hour or so dashed through between the wagon and the sidewalk knocking down and running over the youngest boy. A bystander hurriedly gathered the boy up and hastened to his home with him; meanwhile the boy had found his voice and used it to the best advantage. Doctor Farley was hastily summoned who found that no bones were broken and no serious injury sustained though the little fellow had sustained several bad cuts about the head. The horse belonged to Mr. Rapin and had broken out of its stall and men were attempting to capture it when the accident occurred. It seems almost a miracle that the boy was not killed outright.

The Grand Army boys will swell the cry "Down with Cleveland, the soldier-hater!"

And now the old veteran, whom Cleveland has steadly opposed for the last four years, will at last have a chance to get even with the celebrated soldier-hater, at the polls. Watch his vote.

Henry Wight has served a formal notice on Sandy to "turn over all unlicked stamps and all boxes now in use in the post office on the 6th day of March, 1889. Sandy has the matter under consideration and will reply after the Ides of November. At present his ideos do not coincide with the affirmative.

A feeling of uneasiness was manifest during the convention least Blaine should be the nominee. While it is conceded that Mr. Blaine is one of the ablest men of the nation, the feeling that he could not be elected was most universal and great relief was felt at the final outcome. The only disappointment now is felt by the democrats who were sure the republicans would make the blunder.

Mrs. Laura Fixen spoke in the Baptist Church on Monday evening as advertised. Although a foreigner, she gives evidence of education and a thorough knowledge of the subject; this combined with a strong voice and a large amount of genuine wit, makes her a speaker to whom it is a pleasure and benefit to listen. The audience was rather small, there being other attractions in the city.

Going West.

The general interest that has been taken in the opening of the Montana Indian Reservations is shown by the large numbers of people who have already gone to Great Falls to investigate the mineral and agricultural resources of that wonderful country. The low excursion rate announced by C. H. Warren, Gen. Pass. Agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, makes the expense of exploring this country merely nominal, and will undoubtedly result in a still larger number following. [4-11]

TALMAGE'S SERMON.

The Brooklyn Divine Discourses on the Relations That Should Exist Between Pulpit and Press.

These Two Great Powers Should Perfect a Treaty to Illuminate and Facilitate the World.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., took for the subject of his discourse, "Pulpit and Press Made Allies."

The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.—Luke xvi., 8.

He said: Sacred stupidity and solemn incompetence and sanctified laziness are here rebuked by Christ. He says worldlings are wider awake for opportunities than are Christians. Men of the world grab occasions while Christian people let the most valuable occasions drift by unimproved. That is the meaning of our Lord when he says: "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light."

A marked illustration of the truth of that maxim is in the slowness of the Christian religion to take possession of the secular printing-press. The opportunity is open and has for some time been open, but the ecclesiastical courts and the churches and the ministers of religion are for the most part allowing the golden opportunity to pass unimproved. That the opportunity is open I declare from the fact that all the secular newspapers are glad of any religious facts or statistics that you present them. Any animated and stirring article relating to religious themes they would gladly print. They thank you for any information in regard to churches. If a wrong has been done to any Christian church or Christian institution you could go into any newspaper of the land and have the real truth stated. Dedication services, ministerial ordinations and pastoral installations, corner-stone laying of a church, anniversary of a charitable society will have reasonable space in any secular journal if it have previous notice given. If I have some great injustice done me there is not an editorial or a reportorial room in the United States into which I could not go and get myself set right; and that is true of any well-known Christian man. Already the daily secular press during the course of each week publishes as much religious information and high moral sentiment as does the weekly religious press. Why, then, does not our glorious Christianity embrace these magnificent opportunities? I have before me a subject of first and last importance: How shall we secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement to religion and the pulpit?

The first thing toward this result is cessation of indiscriminate hostility against newspaperdom. You might as well denounce the legal profession because of the shysters, or the medical profession because of the quacks, or merchandise because of the swindling bargain-makers, as to slam-bang newspapers because there are recreant editors and unfair reporters and unclean columns. Guttenberg, the inventor of the art of printing, was about to destroy his types and extinguish the art because it was suggested to him that printing might be suborned into the service of the devil, but afterward he bethought himself that the right use of the art might more than overcome the evil use of it, and so he spared the type and the intelligence of all following ages. But there are many to-day in the depressed mood of Guttenberg with uplifted hammer wanting to pound to pieces the type, who have not reached his better mood in which he saw the art of printing to be the rising sun of the world's illumination. If instead of fighting newspapers we spend the same length of time and the same vehemence in marshaling their help in religious directions, we would be as much wiser as the man who gets consent of the railway superintendent to fasten a car to the end of a railroad train shows better sense than he who runs his wheelbarrow up the track to meet and drive back the Chicago limited express. The silliest thing that a man ever does is to fight a newspaper, for you may have the floor for utterance perhaps one day in the week while the newspaper has the floor every day of the week. Napoleon, though a mighty man, had many weaknesses, and one of the weakest things he ever did was to threaten that if the English newspapers did not stop their adverse criticism of himself he would with four hundred thousand bayonets cross the channel for their chastisment.

Don't fight newspapers. Attack provokes attack. Better wait until the excitement blows over and then go in and get justice, for get it you will if you have patience and common sense and equipoise of disposition. It ought to be a mighty sedative that there is an enormous amount of common sense in the world, and you will eventually be taken for what you are really worth, and you cannot be puffed up and you cannot be written down, and if you are the enemy of good society that fact will come out, and if you are the friend of good society that fact will be established. I know what I am talking about for I can draw on my own experience. All the respectable newspapers as far as I know are my friends now. But many of you remember the time when I was the most continuously and meanly attacked man in this country. God gave me grace not to answer back and I kept silence for ten years, and much grace it required. What I said was perverted and twisted into just the opposite of what I did say. My person was maligned and I was presented as a gorgon, and I was maliciously described by persons who never saw me as a monstrosity in body, mind and soul. There were millions of people who believed that there was a large sofa in this pulpit, although we never had anything but a chair, and that during the singing by the congregation I was accustomed to lie down on that sofa and dangle my feet over the end. Lying New York correspondents for ten years misrepresented our church services, but we waited and people from every neighborhood of Christendom came here to find the magnitude of the falsehoods concerning the church and concerning myself. A reaction set in, and now we have justice, full justice, more than justice, and as much over-praise as once we had under-appreciation, and no man that ever lived was so much indebted to a newspaper press for opportunity to preach the gospel as I am. Young men in the ministry, young men in all professions and occupations, wait. You can afford to wait. Take rough misrepresentation as a Turkish towel to start up your languid circulation, or a system of massage or Swedish movement whose pokes and pulls and twists and thrusts are salutary treatment. There is only one person you need to manage, and that is yourself. Keep your disposition sweet by communion with the Christ, who answered not again, the society of genial people, and walk out in the sunshine with your hat off and you will come out all right. And don't join the crowd of people in our day who spend much of their time damning newspapers.

Again, in this effort to secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement of religion and the pulpit, let us make it the avenue of religious information. If you put the facts of churches and denominations of Christians only into the columns of religious papers, which do not in this country have an average of more than ten thousand subscribers, what have you done as compared with what you do if you put these facts through the daily papers which have hundreds of thousands of readers. Every little denomination must have its little organ supported at great expense, when with one-half the outlay a column or half a column of room might be rented in some semi-omnipotent secular publication, and so the religious information would be sent round and round the world. The world moves so swiftly to-day that news a week old is stale. Give us all the great church facts and all the revival tidings the next morning or the same evening. My advice, often given to friends who propose to start a new paper is: "Don't! Don't! Employ the papers already started." The biggest financial hole ever dug in this American continent is the hole in which good people throw their money when they start a newspaper. It is almost as good and as quick a way of getting rid of money as buying stock in a gold mine in Colorado. Not more printing presses but the right use of those already established. All their cylinders, all their steam power, all their pens, all their types, all their editorial chairs and reportorial rooms are available if you would engage them in behalf of civilization and Christianity.

Again, if you would secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement of religion and the pulpit, extend widest and highest Christian courtesies to the representatives of journalism. Give them easy chairs and plenty of room when they come to report occasions. For the most part they are gentlemen of education and refinement, graduates of colleges, with families to support by their literary craft, many of them weary with the push of a business that is precarious and fluctuating, each one of them the avenue of information to thousands of readers, their impression of the services to be the impression adopted by multitudes. They are connecting links between a sermon or a song or a prayer and this great population that tramp up and down the streets day by day and year by year with their sorrows uncomforted and their sins unpardoned. More than eight hundred thousand people in Brooklyn and less than seventy-five thousand in churches, so that our cities are not so much preached to by ministers of religion as by reporters. Put all journalists into our prayers and sermons. Of all the hundred thousand sermons preached to-day there will not be three preached to journalists, and probably not one. Of all the prayers offered for classes of men innumerable the prayers offered for this most potential class will be so few and rare that they will be thought a preacher's idiosyncrasy. This world will never be brought to God until some revival of religion sweeps over the land and takes into the kingdom of God editors and reporters, compositors, pressmen, and newsboys. And if you have not faith enough to pray for that and toil for that, you had better get out of our ranks, and join the other side, for you are the unbelievers who make the wheels of the Lord's chariot drag heavily. The great final battle between truth and error, the Armageddon, I think, will not be fought with swords and shells and guns, but with pens—quill pens, steel pens, gold pens, fountain pens—and before that the pens must be converted. The most divinely-honored weapon of the past has been the pen, and the most divinely-honored weapon of the future will be the pen—prophet's pen, and evangelist's pen, and apostle's pen, followed by the editor's pen, and reporter's pen, and author's pen. God save the pen! The wing of the Apocalyptic angel will be the printed page. The printing press will roll ahead of Christ's chariot to clear the way.

"But," some one might ask, "would you make the Sunday newspapers also a reinforcement?" Yes, I would. I have learned to take things as they are. I would like to see the much-scoffed-at old Puritan Sabbath come back again. I do not think the modern Sunday will turn out any better men and women than were your grandfathers and grandmothers under the old-fashioned Sunday. To say nothing of other results, Sunday newspapers are killing editors, reporters, compositors, and pressmen. Every man, woman, and child is entitled to twenty-four hours of nothing to do. If the newspapers put on another set of hands that does not relieve the editorial and reportorial room of its cares and responsibilities. Our literary men die fast enough without killing them with Sunday work. But the Sunday newspaper has come to stay. It will stay a good deal longer than any of us stay. What then shall we do? Implore all those who have anything to do with issuing it to fill it with moral and religious information; live sermons and facts elevating. Urge them that all divorce cases be dropped and instead thereof have good advice as to how husbands and wives ought to live lovingly together. Put in small type the behavior of the swindling church member and in large type the contribution of some Christian man toward an asylum for feeble-minded children or a seaside sanitarium. Urge all managing editors to put meanness and impunity in type pearl or agate, and charity and fidelity and Christian consistency in brevier or bourgois. It we can not drive out the Sunday newspaper let us have the Sunday newspaper converted. The fact is that the modern Sunday newspaper is a great improvement on the old Sunday newspaper. What a beastly thing was the Sunday newspaper thirty years ago! It was enough to destroy a man's respectability to leave the tip end of it sticking out of his coat pocket. What editorials! What advertisements! What pictures! The modern Sunday newspaper is as much an improvement on the old-time Sunday newspaper as one hundred is more than twenty-five. In other words, about 75 percent. improvement. Who knows that by prayer and kindly consultation with our literary friends we may have it lifted into a positively religious sheet printed on Saturday and only distributed, like the American Messenger, or the Missionary Journal, or the Sunday-School Advocate, on Sabbath mornings. All things are possible with God, and my faith is up until nothing in the way of religious victory would surprise me. All the newspaper printing presses of the earth are going to be the Lord's, and telegraph and telephone and type will yet announce nations born in a day. The first book ever printed was the Bible by Faust and his son-in-law, Schoeffer, in 146), and that consecration of type to the holy scriptures was a prophecy of the great mission of printing for the evangelization of all the nations. The father of the American printing press was a clergyman, Rev. Jesse Glover, and that was a prophecy of the religious use that the gospel ministry in this country were to make of the types.

Again, we shall secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement of religion and the pulpit by making our religious utterances more interesting and spirited, and then the press will reproduce them. On the way to church some fifteen years ago a journalist said a thing that has kept me ever since thinking. "Are you going to give us any points to-day?" "What do you mean?" I asked. He said: "I mean by that anything that will be striking enough to be remembered." Then I said to myself: What right have we in our pulpits and Sunday-schools to take the time of people if we have nothing to say that is memorable. David did not have any difficulty in remembering Nathan's thrust: "Thou art the man;" nor Felix in remembering Paul's point-blank utterance on righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come; nor the English king any difficulty in remembering what the court preacher said, when, during the sermon against sin, the preacher threw his handkerchief into the king's pew to indicate whom he meant. The tendency of criticism in the theological seminaries is to file off from our young men all the sharp points and make them too smooth for any kind of execution. What we want, all of us, is more point, less humdrum. If we say the right thing in the right way the press will be glad to echo and re-echo it. Sabbath-school teachers, reformers, young men and old men in the ministry, what we all want if we are to make the printing press an ally in Christian work is that which the reporter spoken of suggested—points, sharp points, memorable points. But if the thing be dead when uttered by living voice, it will be a hundred-fold more dead when it is laid out in cold type.

Now, as you all have something to do with the newspaper press, either in issuing a paper or in reading it, either as producers or patrons, either as sellers or purchasers of the printed sheet, I propose on this Sabbath morning, June 17, 1888, a treaty to be signed between the church and the printing press, a treaty to be ratified by millions of good people, if we rightly fashion it; a treaty promising that we will help each other in our work of trying to illumine and felicitate the world, we by voice, you by pen, we by speaking only that which is worth printing, you by printing only that which is fit to speak. You help us and we will help you. Side by side be these two potent agencies until the judgment day, when we must both be scrutinized for our work, healthful or blasting. The two worst off men in that day will be the minister of religion and the editor if they wasted their opportunity. Both of us are the engineer of long express trains of influence, and we will run them into a depot of light or tumble them off the embankment.

What a useful life and what a glorious departure was that of the most famous of all American printers, Benjamin Franklin, whom infidels in the penury of their resources have often fraudulently claimed for their own, but the printer who moved that the Philadelphia convention be opened with prayer—the resolution lost because a majority thought prayer unnecessary—and who wrote at the time he was viciously attacked: "My rule is to go straight forward in doing what appears to me to be right, leaving the consequences to providence," and who wrote this quaint epitaph showing his hope of resurrection—an epitaph that I hundreds of times read while living in Philadelphia:

The body of
Benjamin Franklin, printer,
(Like the cover of an old book,
Its contents torn out,
And stript of its lettering and gilding)
Lies here food for worms.
Yet the work itself shall not be lost,
For it will (as he believed) appear once more
In a new
And more beautiful edition
Corrected and amended
By The Author.

That providence intends the profession of reporters to have a mighty share in the world's redemption is suggested by the fact that Paul and Christ took a reporter along with them and he reported their addresses and reported their acts. Luke was a reporter, and he wrote not only the book of Luke but the acts of the apostles, and without that reporter's work we would have known nothing of the Pentecost, and nothing of Stephen's martyrdom, and nothing of Tabitha's resurrection, and nothing of the jailing and unjailing of Paul and Silas, and nothing of the shipwreck at Melita. Strike out the reporter's work from the Bible and you kill a large part of the new testament. It makes me think that in the future of the kingdom of God the reporters are to bear a mighty part.

About thirteen years ago a representative of an important newspaper took his seat in this church one Sabbath night, about five pews from the front of this pulpit. He took out pencil and reporter's pad, resolved to caricature the whole scene. When the music began he began, and with his pencil he derided that, and then derided the prayer, and then derided the reading of the scriptures, and then began to deride the sermon. But, he says, for some reason, his hand began to tremble, and he, rallying himself, sharpened his pencil and started again, but broke down again, and then put pencil and paper in his pocket and his head down on the front of the pew and began to pray. At the close of the services he came and asked for the prayers of others and gave his heart to God; and though still engaged in newspaper work he is an evangelist, and hires a hall at his own expense and every Sabbath afternoon preaches Jesus Christ to the people. And the men of that profession are going to come in a body througout the country. I know hundreds of them, and a more genial or highly-educated class of men it would be hard to find; and, though the tendency of their profession may be toward skepticism, an organized, common-sense gospel invitation would fetch them to the front of all Christian endeavor. Men of the pencil and pen, in all departments, you need the help of the Christian religion. In the day when the people want to get their newspapers at 3 cents, and are hoping for the time when they can get any of them at one cent, and as a consequence, the attaches of the printing-press are by the thousand ground under the cylinders, you want God to take care of you and your families. Some of your best work is as much unappreciated as was Milton's "Paradise Lost," for which the author received $25; and the immortal poem "Hohenlinden," of Thomas Campbell, when he first offered it for publication and in the column called "Notices to Correspondents" appeared the words: "To T. C.—The lines commencing 'On Linden when the sun was low' are not up to our standard. Poetry is not T. C.'s forte."

O men of the pencil and pen, amid your unappreciated work you need encouragement and you can have it. Printers of all Christendom, editors, reporters, compositors, pressmen, publishers, and readers of that which is printed, resolve that you will not write, set up, edit, issue, or read anything that debases body, mind, or soul. In the name of God, by the laying on of the hands of faith and prayer, ordain the printing-press for righteousness and liberty and salvation. All of us, with some influence that will help in the right direction, let us put our hands to the work imploring God to hasten the consummation. A ship with hundreds of passengers, approaching the South American coast, the man on the lookout neglected his work and in a few minutes the ship would have been dashed to ruin on the rocks. But a cricket on board the vessel that had made no sound all the voyage set a shrill call at the smell of land, and the captain, knowing that habit of the insect, the vessel was stopped in time to avoid an awful wreck. And so insignificant means now may do wonders and a scratch of a pen may save the shipwreck of a soul.

Are you all ready for the signing of the contract, the league, the solemn treaty proposed between journalism and evangelism? Aye, let it be a Christian marriage of the pulpit and the printing-press. The ordination of the former on my head, the pen of the latter in my hand, it is appropriate that I publish the bands of such a marriage. Let them from this day be one in the magnificent work of the world's redemption.

Let thrones, and powers, and kingdoms be
Obedient, mighty God, to thee;
And over land, and steam, and main,
Now wave the scepter of thy reign,
O let that glorious anthem swell,
Let host to host the triumph tell,
Till not one rebel heart remains,
But over all the Saviour reigns.

Theodore Hook's Daughter

From London Letter to Boston Herald.

Recently a paupers grave closed over the remains of the youngest and hitherto the sole surviving child of Theodore Hook—Miss Martha Hook. Theodore Hook died in Fulham, a London suburb, fortysix years ago the 24th day of last August, at the comparatively early age of 53 years. His wife died some years previous. He was one of those gifted children of genius who from his earliest years it was nearly impossible to instruct in the regular manner. Precocious and vivacious, Theodore made the lives of his tutors very likely to put it mildly. Therefore his education was rather inadequate and came to a dead pause at Harrow.

During this time his father was musical director of Vauxhall Gardens the fashionable lounging resort of the day. Young Hook began composing songs and music for the gardens with amazing rapidity. At 16 years of age the lad wrote a drama, entitled "The Soldier's Return," which was very successful. From this on he turned out farces, vaudville and songs with bewildering confusion. Other boys were at school, hard at work over their lessons, when young Hook was the talk of the town, the wit of the green room and the boon companion of actors, literary men and women and painters. He became a great punster, his sayings were quoted far and wide; he perpetrated audacious practical jokes and became the first society improvisator of the time. He used to get from £20 to £30 an evening for his drawing room entertainments. The money was paid very quietly, each one of his hosts being supposed to have him as a guest alone. It was an immense favor to get Hook to present himself at an evening party, and his books were crowded with engagements through-out the London season. He was, in short, the George Grossmith of his day. He became a great chum of the prince regent who sent him in 1812, to Mauritius as accountant general and treasurer, at a salary of over $10,000 per year. Pause in this reminiscence to again impress on your mind that his daughter died this week in the most abject poverty and lies in a pauper grave!

MARKETS—Chicago.

CHICAGO, Special Telegram, June 23.—Receipts—Cattle, 2,300 head; hogs, 11,000 head. Shipments: Cattle, 1,000 head; hogs, 5,500 head.

CATTLE—The general cattle market was slow from start to finish and prices averaged low, especially for Texans. Very few good native beef cattle were on sale, and as the shipping and local demand was light they were neglected. Several lots of fair to good steers averaging 1,150@1,400 lbs remained unsold up to a late hour. Texas cattle sold to canners at $1.80@2.40 for bulls and cows, and at $2.50@3.50 for poor to good steers. A few common grass native, averaging 1,100@1,240 lbs, sold at $3.80@4.20, and corn-fed steers, averaging 1,050@1,300 lbs, sold at $4.45@5.50. Native butcher stock was in light supply, and the demand was correspondingly light. Canners preferred Texas cattle at prevailing prices. Stock cattle were dull and nominally unchanged.

HOGS—The number of fresh and stale hogs on sale were about 11,000. The market opened slow and common grades averaged about 5c lower. The better grades, especially good light, were firmly held. The demand was principally from packers, there being only a few shipping orders on the market. The quality was good, but the supply of prime heavy was light. The highest price reported was $5.70, and the bulk of good heavy sold at $5.60@5.65; fair packing hogs sold at $3.55, and rough heavy at $5.45@5.50; mixed grades sold at $5.40@5.67½, largely at $5.55@5.65. Most of the good light sold at $5.60, with common light at $5.15@5.30, and a few fancy light at $5.65.

Slavery in the British Colonies.

From the New York Sun.

The awful story received in London from the Solomon islands a few days ago about the merciless butchery of the unfortunate natives who resisted Mr. Popham, agent of the Queensland government, and the crew of the steamer Dick, who were at the islands in search of native "apprentices," confirms the stories told by American ship captains and not denied by British papers about slavery in the British colonies. The return of the man-of-war Opal "to revenge" the death of the white kidnappers, subject to her gracious majesty, the queen, and the shelling of the native villages and the great destruction of innocent lives, forms another historic picture quite as dark as any ever painted by Don Pedro Blanco in the swamps at Gallinas, on the west coast of Africa.

The worst feature of this slave trade, carried on under the guise of apprenticeship, is that the British people know all about it. The crimes against humanity that have been committed by the crews of vessels sent out to secure "recruits" have been detailed often in court reports in British and colonial papers. A case in point occurred in 1884. The Queensland schooner Stanley, having a cargo of recruits on board, was in the latter part of June of that year becalmed in latitude 6° south and longitude 153 east. The Kanakas were in charge of Mr. McMurdo, the government agent. They had been captured by force and fraud among the islands. A lot of the unfortunate blacks was sick, and their companions, seeing their condition, tried to induce Mr. McMurdo to take them back to their homes by pitiful signs, gestures and the offer of a shell armlet, the only thing of value they possessed. They were scorned. Some tried to jump overboard. They were whipped. On July 1st a strong breeze came on from the southwest, and Capt. Davies, the master of the vessel, cracked on all sail and carried it until the square sail blew out of the bolt ropes, and a few minutes later found his vessel hard on shore on the spur of the coral ledge known as Indispensable reef. There they were 116 souls, at the mercy of the first great storm that should arise, many leagues from any shore, and one small boat at hand that might carry a dozen. There they stayed, too, for fifty-three long days. An attempt was made to build a raft.

The natives could not understand the orders of the white men; the whites could not understand the explanations or the oral appeals for mercy of the blacks. Some fell sick and could not work and were flogged for obstinacy. An ordinary three tailed cat "did not take hold right," as Mr. McMurdo said, and he had one with five tails braided with strips of lead in it. Six of the blacks were thrashed—one of them to death. The others were sprinkled on their bleeding backs with the salt spray of the ocean. Food and water gave out. The natives were put on an allowance of a pint of water a day. These blacks ordinarily drink a gallon and a half in twenty-four hours. On the short allowance they drooped, went mad and died.

Finally the Sydney trader Venture hove in sight. Fortunately no great storm had arisen. Such as remained alive, including about eighty of the recruits in all, were taken on board, the recruits to be sent to Queensland, where they became the slaves for three years at least of brutal masters; the white men to go through a mockery of a trial for manslaughter. These facts were brought out in the trial.

Thirty years ago British frigates patrolled the coast of Africa to capture Portuguese slavers, who were as harsh to their victims as circumstances demanded and no harsher. The blacks were crowded into the hold under sealed hatches, they were whipped, they were tortured to death, but only to enforce obedience and secure the safety of the white masters. That was just about what happened on Indispensable reef in July and August, 1884. But it was rare, almost an unheard-of thing, for the slavers of thirty years ago to shell the villages of their victims, murdering women and children indiscriminately.

REPUBLICAN COLUMN.

Terrorism in the South.

Ex-Congressman John R Lynch, of Mississippi, says in an interview that the republicans, although they have a majority of 30,000 in that state, are absolutely certain to be counted out in the election this fall. "That," he declares, "is the frozen truth, and nobody denies it. We have no more chance to get an honest count than we have to get the moon. What is a majority of 30,000 undisciplined illiterate blacks against the confederate army? It took the whole north to put that army down some time ago, and you can't expect us to do it all by ourselves. We can do nothing but take our medicine and look pleasant."

The Rebel Bloody Sheriff.

The rebel General Bradley T. Johnson, of Baltimore, is outspoken in his glorification over treason's triumph. He is one of those democrats who believes in speaking his sentiments. In a recent speech at a confederate cemetry in Baltimore, when a large portion of his audience consisted of ex-soldiers of the rebel army, General Johnson congratulated his hearers upon, as he stated, the cause for which they fought is stedily gaining headway. "Confederate ideas," said this valorous rebel chieftan, "are coming to the front at a rapid pace." He then enumerated some of the most prominent recent victories. He said: "We have chosen a President; we have sent many men to congress; our old leaders are present leaders in the management of the government;" and more of the same style of talk was indulged in. There is not a democrat at the North who will concede that such talk as that by a rebel general is "waving the bloody shirt," but if a northern man utters a complaint against the South for disfranchising hundreds of thousands of legal voters, or intimates that the southern confederacy is claiming and getting too much, he is at once pronounced a waver of the "bloody shirt." General Bradley T. Johnson has been speaking the sentiments of the "Solid South," and they are the sentiments of a very large number of the democratic party at the North. Read a portion of his speech quoted in an article on the first page, headed, "They Are Happy."—Milwaukee Sunday Telegraph.

The Oregon Victory.

Portland Oregonian.

By far the most spirited canvas ever witnessed in Oregon terminated in the recent election. The result is the most significant triumph ever gained by the republicans in the state.

In all parts of the state the republicans appeared at the polls with extraordinary spirit. The efforts made by the administration at Washington, through its agents and office-holders, to carry the state stimulated the republicans to unusual activity and exertion. It is certain too, that many democrats in all parts of the state, condemning the policy of the administration on the tariff question, have voted with the republicans. From first to last in the discussion the democrats have lost and the republicans have gained.

It is certain from the result that Oregon is a protection state. It may now be accepted as a fixed fact that protection of the industries and products of the state, through a tariff adjusted to secure them against foreign competition, will be maintained, so far as the votes of the people of Oregon can help to maintain it.

This vote in Oregon points to a like result in all the Northern states. The people of these states will not, indeed, object to revision and reduction of the tariff, provided the principle of revision and reduction is just and fair; but they will insist that the reduction shall not be accomplished on any partisan or sectional scheme, and that regard shall always be had for the interests of the country.

The utmost power of the administration has been employed to swing Oregon from her Republican moorings. Not only has the effort failed, but Oregon is more strongly and firmly Republican than ever before. An announcement that Oregon has gone Democratic will be telegraphed to-day to raise a whoop in the St. Louis convention. And the way in which Oregon has dealt with the administration's tariff policy is an indication of the treatment that both the administration and its policy will receive at the hands of many a state besides Oregon.

Open the Books.

The cry of the democratic party when it entered the last campaign, and all through that campaign, was "Open the books." It is one of the curiosities that now at the threshold of another campaign the democratic party gives forth a cry of exactly the opposite character and demands that the books be not opened. For in the United States senate the other day, when a resolution was up calling on the secretary of the treasury for a statement of the offers and purchase of bonds since April, 1888, with the names of the bidders and purchasers, the whole array of the democratic side made strenuous resistance and demanded that the thing be kept dark and the books shut. When it was openly charged that the bond manipulations of the treasury department showed favoriteism to certain banks and certain political quarters in New York, and that there were secret partners of the government, still instead of shouting, "Open the books!" as they did four years ago, the democratic leaders insisted and implored that darkness was better than light and that the country should be kept in ignorance of the truth, and even that no effort be made to develop the truth from the public record. Why is this thus? Four years ago the republican party responded: The books are open; the records are free; look at them, examine them, turn on the light of day and see if they are not right. But the democratic party said: "We want not only to see but to have full charge of the books, and then perhaps we will find something wrong." Well, they got charge of the books, and the pretense that anything was wrong was abandoned three years ago, and no democrat during that time has had the nerve to insinuate that anything had been or could be found wrong. And now when the same demand is made on the democratic party which it made it swallows its own stomach, crawls into a dark hole and pulls the hole in after it.—Sioux City Journal.

Rather Tardy.

When Rugged old Samuel Johnson was struggling in poverty and obscurity to interest men of means and influence in aiding him during the preparation of his great dictionary and in giving it a favorable introduction to the public, he sought to secure the countenance of the earl of Chesterfield for his work. A kindly word of confidence and approbation from that nobleman would have been of great value to the poor author in securing in advance subscriptions for his projected book, as the custom of that day was. It was refused. Seven years later, when all obstacles in the way had been overcome, the book ready for publication, and its success assured, the earl gave it that commendation which, coming at an earlier period, would have saved Dr. Johnson a vast amount of effort and anxiety. Thereupon he wrote the earl the famous letter, in which he said: "Seven years, my lord, have now passed since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favor. * * * The notice you have been pleased to take of my labors, had it been early, had been kind; but it had been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it: till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known and do not want it."

There are many people in the United States who will receive the declaration of the St. Louis convention in favor of the "maintenance of an indissoluble union of indestructible states" with feelings like those aroused in Dr. Johnson's mind by the Earl of Chesterfield's tardy commendation. Such an expression by a democratic national convention in 1864, would have been of great value. Then a formidable insurrection had organized great armies and the dissolution of the Union was threatened. The rebellion was powerfully encouraged and strengthened by the belief that a large proportion of northern democrats were in sympathy with it and might be brought to its aid. An authoritative declaration by the representatives of that party then would have shortened the war, and saved many lives and much effusion of blood, but that declaration was withheld. Now, when no one is threatening it, the assurance of fidelity to the victorious Union is of no great value.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Ten Years Dead.

His face was a stricking one. Day after day as I sat in the public library this face was opposite. If I raised my eyes from my reading he was there, poring over a pile of pamphlets or sitting with dreamy, sorrowful face over his forgotton book. He was a man of middle age apparently, with an air of refinement in his entire person. His hair was thick and white and was pushed back from a fine sensitive face. But more than all there was a look of measureless sorrow in every quivering line. He was so silent, so reserved, so intent, in the midst o the turmoil of the busy city, that hl had upon me the effect of an apparition. A mere accident put us upon speaking terms, and as we met from day to day he grew less reserved. One day as we were leaving the library I said: "George, I wish you would tell me your story." A spasm of pain crossed his forehead and he hesitated, but sympathy in my voice interested him. He said: "I will tell you. But let us go to my room."

When we reached his room in the hotel, I sat down and waited for him to begin. After a silence of some minutes, during which he sat with bowed head, this singular man, who seemed more and more ghostly to me as I looked at his thin hands and face, began in a subdued voice:

"I suppose I have the most remarkable as well as the most sorrowful history that ever entered your ears. I was born and reared upon a farm in the central part of this state. I passed the ordinary life of a farmer lad, working in summer and going to the district school in winter, leading a careless, happy boyhood. At 15 years of age I entered the preparatory department of a neighboring college. During vacation I worked on the farm.

In this way I spent six years, graduating, at a little past my majority, with credit. That summer I spent upon the farm, working busily, till in August I received a note from the principal of the college, saying that I had been elected to the place of tutor of language and literature. I strained ever faculty to get ready for the work the coming September. I was engaged to be married to a young girl I had met at the college and all seemed bright and happy. My God, how bright and happy that time seems to me now as I look across that awful abyss—

"Excuse me, Sir, for giving away to my feelings," said the speaker, speaking with long pauses like one panting with fatigue. "The last thing which I remember before that chasm came into my life was a quarrel with my father. I had been studying hard, and my eyes had menaced my studies and I was irritable. We were both of a passionate nature. He was a good father and a man of worth had integrity, but intensely practical. He had little respect for Greek and Latin and would sometimes jest about my studies. On that dreadful day I retorted sharply to his jesting words, and one word followed another till in passionate anger he ordered me to leave his house forever. I remember turning in convulsive rage and raising my arm—then a swift dread blackness fell upon me like a cloud and my brain melted under a searing heat."

There was a long silence, during which my narrator sat with bowed head, while I with soul profoundly stirred by the agony in his voice, listening to the dull roar of the human tide that beat and lashed along the street. Then he began again in a low monotonous key that thrilled me.

"When I regained consciousness, I was lying upon a heap of straw. I did not immediately know this, but it came gradually. I did not think—the sensation of rustling straw seemed to come into my mind of itself. I remember feeling it wonderingly with my hands. I seemed to be wrapt in a mist, through which familiar sounds made their way faintly as from a distance. I heard the trampling as of animals and the noise of farmyard fowls crooning and cackling. Slowly my frozen brain resumed its work, and I felt rather than saw I was in a stable and heard the cattle on either side of me. Then a stable-boy roused me with a cry that was like a shock to my faculties and I rose feebly. I remember thinking the boy had almost a comical look of terror upon his chubby face and he breathed hard. My sensation was of bewilderment. All was unaccountable, all a mystery. I looked down at my feet and saw they were covered by coarse but new shoes. I was dressed in a strong, clean gray suit like a miller's working suit. I wondered at the long beard upon my face, at my sleeping in a stable. I felt weak and hungry and asked the boy for food. He started away at the sound of my voice but came back and resumed looking at me. As I again asked for food, he told me to come with him, and when I stepped slowly out into the open air and saw the morning sunlight streaming down the valley and over the meadow, saw the brook and the orchard, like a wave of reviving warmth came the thought I am at home. This was all I was sure of, and I clung to it sinking, even though when I turned to the house all was changed. The trees were tall and the house had grown larger. While these thoughts were knocking at my poor feeble brain, my guide had opened the door of the farmhouse and called to some one within. A mild-featured, white-haired old lady came to the door and said 'Come in.' At the sound of her voice the bonds of my silence were loosed and I cried in a terrible voice 'Mother! Mother! don't you know me?' She turned like a flash and looked at me wildly; then, old as she was, ran to me flinging her arms about my neck. It was my mother, I knew it and yet I did not know it. My mother was merry and had soft, plump cheeks; this mother was old and sad. I reached out my hand and touched her head. I did not know my own name. Trembling with excitement, my mother called, 'Mary, Mary, Arthur has come! "He that was dead is alive again.' At the sound of her voice a young lady of five-and-twenty came running in. My sister Mary! Why my sister was a little dancing girl of 15 with hair in shining ringlets, only yesterday. And with a wild cry I sank under the weight of my maddening thoughts.

"The next I knew I was lying upon a bed in my own familiar chamber and mother sat at my side. And then my mother told me how more than ten years before I had fallen in a fit and brain fever had set in; how one night when the watcher, my father, was momentarily absent, I had arisen and stolen away from the house.

Oh my son, how we searched for you! Father blamed himself, and nearly all he had he spent in sending detectives and letters all over the land. He died, Arthur, trembling with age and sorrow, at 53. 'But God be praised! you are come back to us!' I lay stunned and mute under the tragic intelligence. God in heaven, I was 32 years of age and yet had lived but 22. That 10 years was one long dreamless night! When I became stronger I asked the question I had held in my heart and dared not ask. I asked of Agnes. 'My poor boy,' sobbed my mother; 'Agnes married five years ago. She remained true to you and waited five long years and you never came!' What became of me after that night, how I came home again, and why I had no memory of all those years, these have been my stories. I have visited the asylums of the state and homes of all kinds. I have sent circulars to asylums of all the neighboring states asking if they ever had a patient answering to my description. I am completely baffled in every direction. Again and again I have gone over the mysterious circumstances of my return. No scrap of paper was upon my person and my clothes were neat and clean. My shoes were new but betrayed walking. My brain was numb and weak and refused to control my limbs, and I was very hungry, but my muscles were firm and my body in good health. My hands were slightly bronzed but not calloused by labor. I had not been earning my way by manual labor, neither did I look like one who had lived in confinement. My only tenable theory is that after leaving my bed that night I had wandered away or had been carried to a great distance and kept in some asylum for insane or invalids and there remained for 10 years. Escaping at last, a subtle instinct led me. I am always haunted by the thought that with the cunning of a madmad I took upon myself some character different from the one in which I was advertised and thus escaped detection. Perhaps I lived free and unfettered, perhaps a menial, working at base duties, and perhaps—a thief. With all my journeying, with all I have done, and with all the best detectives can do, not one ray of light has ever perpetrated the darkness of that soundless night. You see before you a man old and white at 36. I am a man without a hope and without a motive, save these I have named. My Agnes is lost to me. I saw her once with her happy children around her, and kept aloof that the chill and damp of my life might not touch her. She does not know of my return; she never will while I live. My return has been kept a secret in my native place. My love for my books and study is gone; my motives for my former reading have died. I am studying, as you see, but only on cases bearing a likeness to mine. I am possessed of an almost insane desire of piercing the impenetrable gloom. I study the reports of the insane and invalid asylums in the vain hope that I may find a clue. My mother and sister plead with me to give up my search and be resigned, but it cannot be. Strangers think me still mad. Think what it is to stand at the very gateway of life, a fair girl ready to walk at our side, ambitious plans opening in your heart, vistas of delight stretching away to the future, then to have a sable hand reach from the unseen shadows and smite you with a thunderbolt, covering your life with the blackness of an eternal night—to slip into a noiseless sea soundless and pitiless to be washed up at the end of 10 years, your love lost to you, a father from whom you parted in rage dead through the grief and remorse, your plans a wreck, tortured by the past and mocked by the future, a writhing worm beneath the remorseless heel of fate, then to say to me if you can, Forget it all and be resigned.

* * * * * * *

I was dumb in the presence of such a man and such an august sorrow. The booming roar of the city's traffic formed a thrilling undertone to that monotonous, intense voice in which he finished his story. With bowed head and tearful eyes I pressed his hand and stepped out into the rushing life of the street. I have framed theory after theory to account for this mystery. It so wrought upon upon me that I called upon the chief of the detective agency, who verified this story. "We detectives," said he, "see continually this shady side of the street, of which you have had a glimpse." He had no tenable theory; he to was baffled at every turn. I past in profound dejection from the presence of Gregory, this gray-haired broken young man, who had thrown over me, a casual listener, the shadow of his profound misery. Small wonder if he be insane.—The New Moon.

Can and Can't.

To say "I can" is to be relieved from the tyranny and thraldom of "I can't."

But thousands to-day believe and are enslaved by the "I can't," where one has been freed through belief in his own "I can." "I can" when followed up points out to him who follows it that he is an ever filling reservoir of force from the illimitable ocean of endless power. "I can't," on the contrary, fills only with weakness, dependence and destruction.

To him who has found this secret and by results proved it, and whose faith in it is ever increasing, there is always given. To him who, persevering, believes in his own inefficiency, there seems to be taken away even that which he hath. "I can," rules all things. "I can't" is ruled by all things. the demon of "I can't" now rules to greater or less extent nine-tenths the people in the land.

"I can't get well," says the sick man, and for that cause he does not. "I can't be anything else but a factory hand or a hod carrier," or some other pittance paid slave of labor, and for that cause they remain factory hands and hod carriers to the end. "I can't" rules far more people than does capital or monopoly. "I Can" is the dominant power of capital and monopoly.

Republican Convention.

First Day.

At Chicago, on June 19 precisely at 12:31 the gavel of Chairman Jones, chairman of the National Republican committee sounded sharply on the mahogany desk, and the Republican convention of 1888 was formally opened. Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus of the Plymouth Congregational Church of Chicago, opened the proceedings with prayer.

Chairman Jones, after Secretary Fessenden had proceeded with the reading of the call appropriating the votes to each state and territory, addressed the convention closing as follows: Gentlemen of the convention: The national committee has requested the announcement of these further officers for your temporary organization. They will be read:

The Secretary—For temporary secretaries: Hon. Charles W. Chisbee of Michigan, Hon. Michael Griffin of Wisconsin, Hon. Ruell of Tennessee.

For Temporary Assistant Secretaries—Hon. James J. Brogan of Tennessee, James Bixby of Minnesota, Henry M. Capes of Arkansas, William Nelson of New Jersey, A. W. Monroe of Maryland, J. E. Wiley of Texas, C. M. Shinno of West Virginia and John E. Miner of Louisiana.

For Temporary Reading Clerks—Hon. Henry Ballard of Vermont, Col. Clarkson Lake of New York, Capt. David Lanning of Ohio, James H. Stone of Michigan and George M. Brinkerhoff of Illinois.

Official Stenographer—Gustavus P. English.

Sergeant-at-Arms—Charles Fitzsimmons of Chicago.

Mr. Jones then said: Gentlemen—At the request of the national republican committee I propose to you as temporary chairman of this convention the Hon. John M. Thurston.

Mr. Thurston then took the chair and was greeted with applause. His opening speech was regarded as exceedingly able, and it created a profound sensation.

Committees were appointed and the day was spent in the work of organization. John C. Fremont, was present as the guest of the Nebraska delegation and in response to enthusiastic calls he was introduced to the convention and made an eloquent speech. Fred Douglas, the colored orator, also made some remarks in response to land demands from the convention.

Second Day.

The second day of the Republican national convention at Chicago was occupied by the committee on credentials, most of their time having been devoted to listening to arguments in the Mahone Wise contest from Virginia.

Permanent organization was affected by the election of M. M. Estel of California as president. Among the vice presidents were: M. S. Chandler, Minnesota; L. B. Richardson, Dakota; H. H. Rood, Iowa; H. O. Fairchild; and among its secretaries appeared the names of J. M. Bailey, Dakota; J. W. Cockburn, Iowa; Geo. B. Edgerton, Minnesota, and G. A. Knapp, Wis.

Third Day.

The principal event of the third day was the adoption of the platform which was received with prodigious enthusiasm, then followed hours of speech-making over the candidates whose names were placed before the convention. The platform adopted is as follows:

THE PLATFORM.

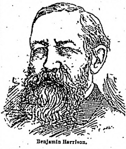
The Republicans of the United States assembled by their delegates in national convention pause on the threshold of their proceedings to honor the memory of their first great leader, the immortal champion of liberty and the rights of the people—Abraham Lincoln, and to cover also with wreaths of imperishable remembrance and gratitude the heroic names of our later leaders who have more recently been called away from our councils—Grant, Garfield, Arther, Logan, Conkling. May their memories be faithfully cherished. We also recall with our greetings and with prayer for his recovery the name of one of our living heroes whose memory will be treasured in the history both of republicans and of the republic—the name of that noble soldier and favorite child of victory, Philip H. Sheridan. In the spirit of those great leaders, and of our own devotion to human liberty, and with that hostility to all forms of despotism and oppression which is the fundamental idea of the republican party, we send fraternal congratulations to our fellow Americans of Brazil upon their great act of emancipation, which completed the abolition of slavery throughout the two American continents. We earnestly hope that we may soon congratulate our fellow citizens of Irish birth upon the peaceful recovery of home rule for Ireland. We reaffirm our unswerving devotion to the national constitution, and to the indissoluble union of the states, to the autonomy reserved to the states under the constitution; to the personal rights and liberties of citizens in all the states and territories in the Union, and especially to the supreme and sovereign right of every lawful citizen, rich or poor, native or foreign born, white or black, to cast one free ballot in public elections and to have that ballot duly counted. We hold the free and honest popular ballot and the just and equal representation of all the people to be the foundation of our Republican government, and demand effective legislation to secure the integrity and purity of authority. We charge that the present administration and the Democratic majority in congress owe their existence to the suppression of the ballot by a criminal nullification of the constitution and laws of the United States. We are uncompromisingly in favor of the American system of protection; we protest against its destruction as proposed by the president and his party. They serve the interests of Europe; we will support the interests of America. We accept the issue and confidently appeal to the people for their judgment. The protective system must be maintained. Its abandonment has always been followed by general disaster to all interests, except those of the usurer and the sheriff. We denounce the Mills bill as destructive to the general business, the labor and the farming interests of the country, and we heartily endorse the consistent and patriotic action of the Republican representative in congress in opposing its passage.

NO FREE WOOL.

We condemn the proposition of the Democratic party to place wool on the free list, and we insist that the duties thereon shall be adjusted and maintained so as to furnish full and adequate protection to that industry. The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the national revenue, by repealing the taxes upon tobacco, which are an annoyance and burden to agriculture, and the tax upon spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes, and by such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor, and release from import duties those articles of foreign production (except luxuries) the like of which cannot be produced at home. If there shall still remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the government, we favor the entire repeal of internal taxes, rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system, at the joint behests of the whisky trusts and the agents of foreign manufacturers. We declare our hostility to the introduction into this country of foreign contract labor, and for Chinese labor, alien to our civilization and our constitution, and we demand the rigid enforcement of the existing laws against it, and favor such immediate legislation as will exclude such labor from our shores. We declare our opposition to all combinations of capital organized in trusts or otherwise, to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens; and we recommend to congress and the state legislatures in their respective jurisdictions, such legislation as will prevent the execution of all schemes to oppress the people by undue charges on their supplies, or by unjust rates for the transportation of their products to market. We approve the legislation by congress to prevent alike unjust burdens and unfair discriminations between the states. We reaffirm the policy of appropriating the the public lands of the United States to be homesteads for American citizens and settlers, not aliens, which the Republican party established in 1862, against the persistent opposition of the Democrats in congress, and which has brought our great Western domain into such magnificent development. The restoration of unearned railroad land grants to the public domain for the use of actual settlers, which was begun under the administration of President Arthur, should be continued. We deny that the Democratic party has ever restored one acre to the people, but declare that by the joint action of Republicans and Democrats about fifty millions of acres of unearned lands, originally granted for the construction of railroads, have been restored to the public domain, in pursuance of the conditions inserted by the Republican party in the original grants. We charge the Democratic administration with failure to execute the laws securing to settlers title to their homesteads, and with using appropriations made for that purpose to harass innocent settlers with spies and prosecutions under the false pretense of exposing frauds and vindicating the law.

JUSTICE TO THE TERRITORIES.

The government by congress of the territories is based upon necessity only, to the end of that they may become states in the Union; therefore, whenever the condtions of population, material resources, public intelligence and morality are such as to insure a stable local government therein, the people of such territories should be permitted, as a right inheritent in them, to form for themselves constitutions and state government and be admitted into the Union. Pending the preparations for statehood, all officers thereof should be selected from the bona fide residents and citizens of the territory wherein they are to serve. South Dakota should of right be immediately admitted as a state in the Union, under the constitution framed and adopted by her people, and we heartily endorse the action of the Republican senate in twice passing bills for her admission. The refusal of the Democratic house of representatives, for partisan purposes, to favorably consider these bills is a willful violation of the sacred American principle of local self-government and merits the condemnation of all just men. The pending bills in the senate for acts to enable the people of Washington, North Dakota and Montana territories to form constitutions and establish state governments should be passed without unnecessary delay. The Republican party pledges itself to do all in its power to facilitate the admission of the territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Idaho and Arizona to the enjoyment of self-government as states, such of them as are now qualified as soon as possible, and the others as soon as they may become so. The political power of the Mormon church in the territories, as exercised in the past, is a menace to free institutions too dangerous longer to be suffered. Therefore we pledge the Republican party appropriate legislation asserting the sovereignty of the nation in all territories where the same is questioned, and in furtherance of that end, to place upon the statute books legislation stringent enough to divorce the political from the ecclesiastical power, and thus stamp out the attendant wickedness of polygamy. The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condemns the policy of the Democratic administration in its efforts to demonetize silver. We demand the reduction of letter postage to one cent per ounce.



Benjamin Harrison.

FREE SCHOOLS.

In a republic like ours, where the citizens is the sovereign, and the official the servant, where no power is exercised except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence. The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us a free nation: therefore the state or nation, or both combined, should support free institutions of learning, sufficient to afford to every child growing up in this land the opportunity of a good common school education. We earnestly recommend that prompt action be taken by congress in the enactment of such legislation as will best secure the rehabilitation of our American merchant marine, and we protest against the passing by congress of a free ship bill, as calculated to work injustice to labor by lessening the wages of those engaged in preparing materials as well as those directly employed in our ship yards. We demand appropriations for the early rebuilding of our navy; for the construction of coast fortifications and modern ordinance and other approved modern means of defense for the protection of our defendless harbors and cities; for the payment of just pensions to our soldiers; for necessary works of national importance in the improvement of harbors and the channel of internal, coastwise and foreign commerce; for the encouragement of the shipping interests of the Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific states, as well as for the payment of the maturing public debt. This policy will give employment to our labor, activity to our various industries, increase the security of our country, promote trade, open new and direct markets for our produce and cheapen the cost of transportation. We affirm this to be far better for our country than the Democratic policy of loaning the government's money without interest to "pet banks." The conduct of foreign affairs by the present administration has been distinguished by its inefficiency and its cowardice. Having withdrawn from the senate all pending treaties effected by Republican administration for the removal of foreign burdens and restrictions upon our commerce and for its extension into better markets, it has neither effected or proposed any others in their stead. Professing adherence to the Monroe doctrine, it has seen with idle complacency the extension of foreign influence in Central America, and of foreign trade everywhere among our neighbors. It has refused to charter, sanction or encourage any American organization for constructing the Nicaragua canal, a work of vital importance to the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, and of our national influences in Central and South America and necessary for the development of trade with our Pacific territory, with South America and with the islands and further coasts of the Pacific ocean.

THE FISHERIES.

We arraign the present Democratic administration for its weak and unpatriotic treatment of the fisheries question, and its pusillanimous surrender of the essential privileges to which our fishing vessel are entitled in Canadian ports under the treaty of 1818, the reciprocal maritime legislation of 1830 and the county of nations, and which Canadian fishing vessels receive in the ports of the United States. We condemn the policy of the present administration and the Democratic majority in congress towards our fisheries as unfriendly and particularly unpatriotic, and as tending to destroy a valuable national industry and an indispensable resource of defense against a foreign enemy. The name of American applies alike to all citizens of the Republic and imposes upon all alike the same obligation of obedience to the laws. At the same time that citizenship is and must be the panoply and safeguard of him who wears it, and protect him whether high or low, rich or poor, in all his civil rights. It should and must afford him protection at home and follow and protect him abroad in whatever land he may be in a lawful trade. The men who abandoned the Republican party have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance or freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to wit: "The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under the republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers of free institutions, which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided." The gratitude of the nation to the defenders of the Union cannot be measured by laws. The legislation of congress should conform to the pledges made by a loyal people, and be so enlarged and extended as to provide against the possibility that any man who honorably wore the Federal uniform shall become an inmate of an almshouse, or dependent upon private charity. In the presence of an overflowing treasury, it would de public scandal to do less for those whose valorous services preserved the government. We denounce the hostile spirit shown by President Cleveland in his numerous vetoes of measures for pension relief, and the action of the Democratic house of representatives in refusing even a consideration of general pension legislation. In support of the principles herewith enunciated, to invite the patriotic men of all parties, and especially of all workingmen whose prosperity was seriously threatened by the free trade policy of the present administration.

Fourth Day.

On the fourth day of the session there was tremendous excitement, the interest was universal, delays of all kinds were experienced, but at last talking closed for a time and balloting commenced. Only three ballots were had and they were as follows:

Alger	84	116	122
Allison	72	73	88
Depew	99	99	91

Sherman	229	249	244
Blain	35	33	35
Lincoln	3	3	2
McKinley	2	3	7
Miller	0	0	2

After these ballots a recess was taken till evening, but when evening came, the convention was not ready, and the time was given up to talking and concussing. Depew withdrew from the contest, and then after scenes of the wildest excitement an adjournment was had till Saturday morning.

Fifth Day.

Much to everybody's astonishment, Saturday came and went, and still there was no nomination, and an adjournment was taken till Monday. It was asserted that the friends of Mr. Blaine had intended to spring a trap and nominate him with a grand hurrah, but that the project wasn't ripe and the plan wouldn't work. The excitement was intense, but only two ballots were taken, making five altogether, as follows:

Sherman	235	224
Gresham	98	87
Harrison	217	213
Alger	135	142
Allison	88	99

McKinley	11	14
FredDouglas	1	......
Forraker	1	......

Sixth Day.—The Ticket Nominated.

On the sixth day the convention convened again, and on the third ballot of the day Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, was nominated. The last three ballots were as follows:

	6th bal.	7th bal.	8th bal.
Harrison	231	278	544
Alger	137	120	100
Allison	73	76	......
Gresham	91	91	59
Sherman	244	231	118
Blaine	40	15	5
McKinley	12	16	4
Col. Grant	1	......	......
Foraker	1	1	......
Lincoln	......	2	......
Haymond	......	1	......

As the states were called, California cast its sixteen votes for Harrison, and then state after state fell into line, and the nomination followed amid great excitement and enthusiasm. The nomination on motion of Gov. Foraker of Ohio, was made unanimous.

The convention then took a recess, and at the evening session, Levi. P. Morton of New York, was nominated for Vice President.

BIOGRAPHY OF HARRISON.

Gen. Benjamin Harrison was born at North Bend, Hamilton county, Ohio, August 20, 1833. He is of English descent, one of his ancestors being a friend and counselor of Oliver Cromwell, taking part in the trial and execution of King Charles I. Shortly after this period the Harrison family immigrated to America and the next one that becomes well known is Benjamin Harrison of Virginia, who performed an active part in all movements of the revolutionary war period, was one of the signers of the declaration of independence, thrice elected Governor of Virginia and a member of the convention that ratified the constitution. He was the father of Gen. William Henry Harrison, President of the United States in 1840, and grandfather of the present nominee of the Republican party.

The subject of the present sketch entered Miami University at Oxford, O., at the early age of 16. After graduating he went to Cincinnati and studied law. In 1854 he removed to Indianapolis, where he has ever since resided, and commenced the practice of law. New issues that were constantly being brought into politics, afforded Mr. Harrison the opportunity of being heard on the stump, and it was but a few years until he was regarded as one of the ablest political speakers in the state.

In 1860 he was elected reporter of the supreme court. In July, 1862, when President Lincoln issued his call for 500,000 three-year troops, Gov. Morton called upon Harrison to aid in recruiting the regiment for the Sixth Indiana district. His commission, bearing date of July 14, 1862, was the first one issued by the famous war governor, and made Harrison a second-lieutenant. He was made captain of Co. A as soon as it was recruited, and when the whole regiment was filled he was selected colonel.

Gov. Morton offered to send some one else into the field in order that Harrison might hold his civil position in Indianapolis. But this offer was refused and Harrison went into the field with his troops. After serving in Kentucky and Tennessee, the regiment in January, 1864, was formally assigned to the first brigade (Ward's) of the third division of the Twentieth army corps, with which body he served until the end of the war. At Resaca he captured the enemy's line and four guns, and at Peach Tree Creek his bravery was such that Gen. Hooker recommended him to the secretary of war for promotion, and he was made brigadier-general.

During his absence in the field the Democratic supreme court declared vacant the office of supreme court reporter, and another person was elected to the position. Leave of absence was granted Gen. Harrison in the fall of 1864, with orders to report to Gov. Morton. During that 30 days he again made a canvass of the state, and was re-elected for another term. Then he rejoined the army, was in the siege of Nashville, served until the surrender of Johnson, and was with his command at the final review of the Union forces in Washington.

In 1868 he declined a re-election as reporter of the supreme court and resumed the practice of law. In 1876 he became the candidate of the Republican party for governor, but owing to a complication of circumstances, was defeated. 1879 he was appointed on the Mississippi river convention, and in 1880 elected United States senator for Indiana as the successor of Joseph E. McDonald, and took his seat on March 4, 1881.

LEVI P. MORTON.

Levi Parsons Morton is in all respects a self-made man. He was born May 16, 1824, at Shoreham in Vermont, just opposite old Fort Ticonderoga. His father, Daniel Oliver Morton, was a Congregational clergyman at Shoreham and Springfield in Vermont, Winchendon, Mass., and Bristol, N. H. His death occurred at the latter place in 1852. The income of a country minister is never large, but in the case of Rev. Mr. Morton it was made to serve the purpose of supporting his family as well as to give his six children a start in the world. It was not a great lift to be sure, but courage, pluck and talent did the rest in the case of Levi P. Morton. At twenty years of age he found himself the proprietor of a small store in Hanover, N. H. It was a "general store," with a little of everything for sale over the counter.

Going soon afterwards to New York, he made a fortune in the dry goods business, and then became a banker. He was the head of the firm of Morton, Bliss & Co., and is a thorough business man—shrewd, enterprising, liberal and intelligent.

During the war, in the dark days of 1862-3, he was one of the firmest supporters of the Union. He never feared, as others did, that the United States might not be able to repay the money needed to carry on the war.

After the war he turned his attention to political affairs, and joined the Republican party. Mr. Morton was elected to congress from the Eleventh district of New York. The district had been strongly Democratic, but his majority was over 7,000. He was re-elected two years after. President Garfield nominated him as minister to France, which was unanimously confirmed by the senate in March 1881. The vacant seat thus created in the house of representatives was filled by Roswell P. Flower. In May 1881, Mr. Morton was appointed honorary commissioner general to the Paris international exhibition of electricity.

Brevities by Telegraph.

Dispatches announce that seven deserters have arrived at the camp of Yumbarga and report that Stanley, after traversing the country of the upper Aruwhimi reached a rough, mountainous country, where he has continuous fights with the natives. He was wounded by an arrow and had lost a large number of his men. Many of his people, they say, are ill, including the Europeans of his party. Stanley is now in the mountains, and surrounded by hostile natives.

Some time ago August Peterson, living three miles west of Red Wing, Minn., discovered traces of oil in the borings from an artesian well. Afterwards some concealed force ejected the drill from the hole. The matter was reported to Professors Porter and Winchell, of the state university, who believe that the prospects are good for finding either oil or natural gas. The sum of $200 of the state funds set aside for this purpose, has been appropriated to develop its find and ascertain its value.

A passenger train on the Wisconsin Central was wrecked near Glidden by a broken rail. The baggage and express car and first and second-class coaches were thrown from the track and the passengers were shaken up, but none seriously injured. The train was running slowly at the time. The track was cleared in a few hours, and the train proceeded to Ashland. The express messenger was thrown against the safe and his ankle bruised. Joseph Blumberg was cut on the head. Charles Fink was cut over his right eye by flying glass. Passengers say their escape was a lucky one.

James Matsch of West Newton, Minn., was thrown from his wagon and probably fatally injured. Three ribs are fractured and he is otherwise hurt.

John Watson of Anoka went up the river from Brainerd to get the body of his brother James, drowned at the dam of Prairie River below Grand Rapids. The body was discovered near where the accident occurred.

Mrs. M. S. Wilkinson died at her home in Wells. She fell some time ago and dislocated her hip, from the effects of which she could not recover.

The recently consolidated Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Maire Railroad company filed in the office of the secretary of state at St. Paul a mortgage for the largest amount in the history of the office. It is $21,000,000 in amount, beside $20,000 additional for every mile of road that the company builds, over 800. The Central Trust company of New York is the mortgagee. The mortgage is to bear five per cent interest.

Eight prisoners escaped from jail at Superior Wis., by breaking a hole through the wall of a cell and descending to the ground outside by means of a rope made of strips of blanket. Among the number are John Oleson and one Murphy, two of the four that broke from the same prison several days ago and were recaptured in Duluth. No trace of their whereabouts has yet been obtained, but their descriptions have been telegraphed to all the neighboring towns.

"Cooley" Stone, a colored jockey at Coney Island, shot and killed Earnest Miller, a bartender at that place, over a dispute regarding beer money. Stone was arrested.

After a pleasant and successful encampment of three days the Southwestern Minnesota G. A. R. association broke camp at Lake Benton. The encampment will be located at Windom for the next year. The officers of the association selected are: Commander J. French of LaGrange post, Windom: senior vice commander, Lang of Stoddard post; junior vice commander, C. C. Goodnow, Pipestone; officers of the day, Terrett of Windom, chaplain, J. D. McBloom; surgeon Dr. Wilson J. J Kendall, of LaGrange post, adjutant. A matter of great importance was the admission of the Sons of Veterans of the district into the association as members of the G. A. R. The friends of the movement have been working hard to secure this recognition and are pleased over the result. The organization was completed and Benedict of Sleepy Eye elected colonel. A resolution recommending Cpat. Aldrich of Lake Shetek to the board of directors of the soldiers' home for superintendent of the home was unanimously passed.

E. G. Fraser, an inmate of Selkirk asylum, near Winnipeg while trying to get a drink of water from a barrel, fell headlong into it and was drowned.

The mangled body of an unknown man was found at Pokegama bridge on the Northern Pacific road. Nothing was found upon his person that would lead to his indentification, and his face was disfigured beyond recognition. No one claimed the body, and it was buried by the coroner. Doubtless the man had attempted to steal a ride by jumping on some train while in motion, and was caught under the wheels.

There is considerable indignation at Winnipeg over the fact that Minnesota flour is now sold in Montreal at prices below those at which Manitoba millers find themselves able to sell. From Brandon, Man., to Montreal by rail via the Canadian Pacific railroad the charge on 100 pounds of flour is 49 cents, while the publicly quoted rate for flour from Minneapolis to Montreal via the "Soo" route and the Canadian Pacific railroad is 25½ cents per 100 pounds. Manitobans claim that the Canadian Pacific having been built by Canadian public money, should at least give rates to Manitoba as low as to Minnesota millers, as the latter are enabled to sell flour cheaper after paying duty.

A gale that caused great loss of life and property set in at Grand River, Quebec. Boats fishing on the Miscou banks were swept away, and as far as can be ascertained six men were drowned.

The Steamer Bertha, which has arrived from Kurluck, Alaska, brought three of the sailors of the codfishing schooner Isabel, which encountered a gale on the 3d of May and had to be abandoned. The men took to the boats, but in a storm got separated. The eight skiffs which contained the 19 men on board the Isabel, at first divided themselves into two parties. After being out three days two of the men went mad from the hardships endured and had to be put in separate boats, and soon were drowned. When another boat capsized. Capt. Nickerson in trying to save the lives of the men was drowned, as were also the men whom he tried to rescue. It is believed that the men in the two boats which got separated from the others were also drowned, making 14 who lost their lives.

William Patterson was hanged at Louisville, Ky. He is a colored man and was convicted with another man, Albert Turner, for assaulting and fatally beating Miss Jennie Bowman on April 23, 1887. Miss Bowman was a domestic employed by a family who lived in a fashionable suburb, and the crime was committed about 10 o'clock in the morning. The family were all absent from the house at the time, and no one witnessed the murder. Turner and Patterson were arrested on suspicion and Turner immediately confessed. Patterson protested his innocence. Turner pleaded guilty, but on the scaffold said Patterson was innocent. He was hung on July 1, 1887. Patterson was tried, convicted, but appealed his case, and the lower court was sustained. The Governor respited him three times, but refused to interfere further. Patterson protested his innocence on the scaffold. He was strangled slowly to death, and four minutes after the drop fell he said: "Curse them" and then "the Lord save me." The struggles were frightful. Many people believe firmly in his innocence and there were strong attempts to secure his pardon.

AN EMPEROR'S FUNERAL.

The Obsequies of a Monarch Just Like Those of a Common Mortal.

In spite of the hurried preparations, the Emperor's funeral was not merely a military display worthy of a great soldier, but a cermonial graced by every evidence of public grief and affection. A heavy rain fell throughout the night. Still the workmen labored on completing the sombre decorations. Potsdam was crowded and accommodations of any kind brought fabulous prices. In the morning rain was still falling, and the clinging draperies gave the route a sad and weird aspect, but as the hours wore on the rain gradually ceased. When the Emperor's children came to take a farewell of their grandfather, the three boys walked hand in hand. There was a little difference in their heights. Then came the little princess, and lastly a nurse carrying the youngest. The eldest boy folded his hands and prayed. As the children retired the imperial family and mourners entered and took up positions. Chaplain Koegel having blessed the Emperor and the King of Saxony, knelt by the coffin and prayed, while the others filed out. The dowager Empress Augusta sat upon the terrace, closely veiled, and Empress Victoria and the other ladies stood on the balcony, while the procession was forming.

The scene when the imperial family emerged from the gloomy hall with its flickering lights, to the exquisite summer beauty of the park, was in strange contrast with that on the occasion of the late Emperor William's funeral. A half hour elapsed before the procession was ready to start yet the time seemed short. The Emperor gave the signal, after having watched every movement in arranging the hearse and the coffin, which was placed very high. Victoria's wreath hung at the foot of the coffin and others lay on the platform around it. The golden helmet of the Hohenzollerns was placed at the head of the coffin. Eighteen generals bore a canopy of velvet. Military bands, stationed at intervals along the route, played the glorious funeral marches of Chopin and Beethoven, never ceasing until the procession had passed.

In Potsdam garlands of oak leaves had been laid upon the ground on either side of the road for a mile or more, and the middle of the road was strewn with oak leaves. Behind the lines of veterans and members of trade societies stood the patient spectators that had been waiting five hours to see the procession pass. The best view of the spectacle was obtained in the town, where every window and roof was thronged. Gen. von Halinke led the procession. The brilliancy of the uncloaked uniforms glittering in the sun presented a picture very different from that presented on the occasion of the funeral of Emperor William. As the cortege moved along every head was uncovered and there was hardly a dry eye. The clergy come first, followed by the court officials. Then came 60 young pages dressed in black hose, scarlet coats and black hats, with ostrich feathers.

A feature of the cortege was the 18 physicians walking side by side. The central figure was the new Emperor. Count Von Moltke walked with difficulty, the exertion being a great strain upon him. The service in the church was most impressive. Old generals were heard to say that although to-day's ceremony was much less grand than the obsequies of Emperor William there was much more in it that appealed to the heart. Fronting in the church was a large cross of forget-me-nots, and there were tall palms and ferns on each side of the archway. The Princess of Wales, the young empress and several of the other princesses had driven by Sans Souci to the church and were there in a retired corner before the procession arrived.

Toward the end of the service there was an interesting incident. A dull light pervaded the building. The curtains were closed everywhere except at one point, where the sun shone in and fell with brilliant radiance on the young Emperor, whose face, aureoled in light, gained a prominence which would otherwise have been impossible in so large an assemblage. When he rose from praying at the coffin his eye filled with tears. Then he sadly bowed his head. The Empress and the Princess of Wales then advanced and were joined by the Prince of Wales, and the three prayed by the coffin, the princess weeping. The other relatives followed. In the archway of the church the Emperor thanked the relatives for their presence and bade them adieu. The church was then cleared and prepared for the solemn services. Empress Victoria, unable to bear the strain of the ceremony drove with the three youngest daughters to Bornstedt, arranging the drive so as to return when all was over. Chaplain Persius arranged a special service for her, none but the Empress and the three daughters being admitted. The Woerth wreath was enclosed in the coffin. On her return from the service at Bornstedt the Empress went to the church unattended and prayed beside the coffin.

Felix Wagner, of Avon, Stearns county, Minn., suddenly died under convulsions, and the circumstances of his death strongly pointed to poisoning. He left a family consisting of a wife and boy aged eleven and the indifference with which Mrs. Wagner contemplated the demise of her husband excited suspicion in the community and public feeling ran high. Coroner Ramsey went to Avon and a post mortem examination took place. A portion of the contents of the stomach were fed to a dog and the canine soon showed the effects of poison. The household of John Lamprecht of Winona, Minn., was startled by the disappearance of his fifteen-year-old daughter, Lavina, who took all her clothing with her. She slipped out at night, having thrown her clothes out the window beforehand. Her father telegraphed all over for her, and finally found that she was at one of the hotels in the city. It seems that she said she was tired of home restraints and had a place to work. Her father feels her escapade deeply, as she had a good home and little work to do.

The other two clung to the boat all night and were cast ashore nine miles from a house, and were forced to make their way through a wilderness of woods, not reaching civilization till late next day.

It is now thirty days since John Zachar, the Caledunian faster of Racine, Wis., partook of food. There is no sham about his case. The family physician states positively that, to his own knowledge, Zachar has not taken one drop of nourishment. The last few days he has taken to sleeping a good deal, and does not take the exercise he formerly did. He is very reticent and quiet, and when told that his meals are ready, merely says: "When I want to eat, I'll let you know."

C., to manage a patent steam petroleum gas generator and Ambler assigned his half interest in trust to Whipple. Suit was brought by Ambler, claiming a violation of trust.

In the British house of commons Mr. Edward Gourley inquired as to the truth of the report that the United States government had sent armed cruisers to Behringsea to seize English seal fishermen. He also asked if the queen's government had sent a war ship to warn the masters of British sealers of the results of infringing upon the Alaskan fishing laws. Rt. Hon. Sir James Ferguson, parliamentary secretary of the foreign office, replied that so far as the government knew no such announcement had been made by the American government. An order had been given from Washington that three British vessels seized in 1886 be released to their owners. With regard to vessels seized in 1887 the government had not heard that any of them had been restored, but the proceedings relating to all the seizures was progressing.

Tracklaying on the Red River Valley road commenced at West Lynne. The Northern Pacific engineers returned to St. Paul in their car, but during their stay they have driven over the entire route of the proposed western extension of the Red River Valley railroad, and it is understood that a satisfactory arrangement was made between the persons interested, the government and the Northern Pacific. The nature of this arrangement has not yet transpired, but it is known in a general way that the arrangement implies stiff competition with the Canadian Pacific for the carrying trade of Manitoba.

The governmental crisis in the German ministry, which the late Emperor Frederick brought about, and which apparently ended in the dismissal of Herr Von Puttkamer, has not been brought to a settlement as yet. Count Von Zeidlitz-Fruzscheler was appointed to succeed Von Puttkamer but the Count's departure afrom Berlin and return to his duties as president of the province of Posen, indicates that the negotiations for his appointment to the Prussian ministry have foiled. They who are familiar with German politics state it would not be surprising if Herr von Puttkamer was reinstated. The office is likely to remain vacant for the present, and after being merged into some other office be restored to Von Puttkamer.

Seventeen-year locusts have made their appearance in the town of Springdale, Wis., covering at present an area of four miles in length by about one eighth in width. All vegetation in their course is being rapidly divested of everything green. The insects are reported to be spreading rapidly. Sheriff Harris thus describes the Northern Pacific train robbery: There were probably eight men, one outfit of five with a wagon and three horses on the south side of the Yellowstone river near the railroad track and three men with horses on the north side of the river. These left their horses and crossed the railroad bridge on foot, joining the others to make the robbery. After effecting their purpose they recrossed and swam the horses across the river to the south side. The wagon was thrown into the river. Two men then went down the river in a skiff. The other three mounted their horses, and after circling among the bluffs on the banks of the Yellowstone struck south toward Wolf mountains in Wyoming, 160 miles from the railroad. Later they crossed Bullock's Fork. Forty miles south of the railroad, where they were joined by the other three horses. The six were now traveling together. Sheriff Irvine of Miles City with two men under Sheriff Reed of Billings, with two men are on their trail.

The Wisconsin supreme court rendered a decision in an important case involving alleged damages to the amount of $148,500. The action was brought in the circuit court of St. Croix county against the St. Croix Boom corporation by the J. S. Taylor Lumber company and others, successors to Walker, Veazie & Co., who at the time the damages were caused were mill owners, and a corporation, and as such transported their goods by steamboat on the St. Croix river. In the court below the plaintiff's were non-suited, a judgment which the supreme now reverses, and remands the case for a new trial.

Mrs. Josephine Marck, of Alleghany City, administered strichnine to her three children, Mary, Helena and Ellen, aged seven three and four respectively, and then swallowed a large draught of the deadly poison herself. In less than three hours Mary, Helena and the mother were dead, and little Ellen was in throes of convulsions with no hopes of recovery. The motive for the deed is not known, but is supposed to have been anger because her husband had ordered a boarder from the house whom he suspected of criminal intimacy with his wife. The husband is almost crazed with grief. He is a hardworking German and has always borne a good reputation. Mrs. Marck was twenty-six years of age and had been married about eight years.

When Gov. McGill arrived at Lake Benton, he was met at the depot by about 1,000 people and the brigade of infantry from the camp. He was escorted to his hotel by Old Abe post, G. A. R., and afterwards addressed the crowd in the camp. In conversation with a reporter he declined to say anything of a political nature, saying he was there for pleasure. The camp has been flooded with farmers' teams and people and only very few could hear the speech.

An important land case comes on for trial at Superior, Wis., before Judge Newman, of Trempeleau, sitting in place of Judge Clough, involving the title to section 25, being part of land platted in Superior. On one side the title is derived from the proprietors of Superior, and the other from James P. Greves, both had conveyances of the land in question from the preemptors. The Greves interest is held by six or seven persons each claiming an undivided acreage. The successors to the proprietors are numerous holders of blocks and fractions of blocks. The property in question is now very valuable.

There was a dance at John Kowilewsky's place in Winona, Minn., the other night. Two fellows drove up in a carriage, danced once or twice, had a few beers and induced two girls to get in a carriage with them. Some time later the neighborhood was shocked by hearing rapidly moving wheels. The shrieks were drowned in a way that suggested a hand slapped over the screamer's mouth. Next morning a lady's hat was found on the ground and Lucy Beracki had Joe Church arrested for assault.

News has been received that all hands on the sealing schooner Venture have been drowned. The Venture was bought at Astoria, Ore., last spring and fitted out with unique sealing gear, including a large seine in which to scoop seals without killing them. The news received now says that three weeks ago two hunters while out in a small boat attending to the net while off Prince Edward's Island, coast of Alaska, were capsized and drowned. The captain and cook, the only survivors, left the schooner in charge of an Indian agent near by and proceeded in a canoe to Ft. Simpson, 70 miles away. They have not been heard of since and it is supposed they must be drowned. The men all belong at Astoria.

In the contest for the election of a county superintendent of schools in Bismarck, D. T., William H. Winchester was re-elected by a majority of about seventy-five over Mrs. E. M. Willson and Miss Edith Killyer. The campaign was interesting from the fact that two ladies were in the field, and the city was deprived of a vote, although it pays over half the salary of the superintendent. Had the city voted Winchester would have been defeated. Of the ladies Miss Hillyer received about three votes for every one cast for Mrs. Wilson.

The following are the charges preferred against Melville W. Fuller, recently appointed chief justice, and which were referred to him by Senator Edmunds: That he concocted and carried out a scheme to take from the funds of the West Chicago park board, $103,000 when $30,000 would have been ample compensation for the owner of the land taken for a boulevard in connection with the West Side park. It also alleged, in the case of Kerr vs. South Park Commissioners, that by reason of his (your) position and influence as jury commissioner of the United States he (you) managed to get that jury out in charge of Bailiff J. J. Douglass, who never before nor since has had charge of a jury in the United States court. That the jury was sent out in charge of Douglass to visit the grounds and that while viewing the grounds he caused the jury to be separated for Mr. Fuller, and six of the jurors were placed where a man employed by Fuller had charge of them, and whose influence with the six jurors so separated induced them to bring in an improper verdict. To Senator Edmunds letter, Mr. Fuller replied while assuring the committee that I intend no disrespect to them, I cannot consent to reply to anonymous assertions of the character referred to in yours of the 11th. But the charges are all denied.

Wellington.

An English nobleman writing of Wellington, just after Waterloo, says: "he is quite unspoilt by success, gay, frank, and ready to converse."

"He has none of the airs of a great man at the head of a hundred thousand men," wrote another; "he is full of life and good-humor."

He rejected the congratulations offered him after his return to Brussels from Waterloo, saying: "It was a dreadful business; thirty thousand men destroyed, and a plagued near thing."

"Oh!" answered the duke to a society woman who asked him to describe Waterloo, "it is very easy done! We pummelled them, they pummelled us, and I suppose we pummelled the hardest, so we gained the day."

Wellington's head was not turned by his popularity. "If any one be disposed to grow giddy with popular applause," he once said, "I think a glance toward my iron shutters will soon sober him."

Those "iron shutters" always reminded the duke of the fickleness of the London mob, and he often referred to them. During the debate on the Reform Bill, which Wellington opposed, the London populace, forgetting his services, broke the windows of Apsley House, his city residence, and did much injury to his property. The duke put up iron shutters to his windows and there they remained until after his death. Some time afterward, when he had regained his popularity, he was followed by a large crowd of men, who cheered him heartily.

He received it all with indifference, but walked his horse to Apsley House. He dismounted at the gate, gave the reins to a servant, turned round to the crowd, pointed to the iron shutters, made an ironical bow, and entered the court without saying a word.

The Eighty-eights.

From the London Globe.

"The eighty-eights in English history not only bring great events, but more particularly they bring foreign invasions." That, says Prof. Seeley, in Good Words for June, is the conclusion which we must arrive at, if we were to play with chronological coincidenences. In 1588, the Spanish armada; in 1688, the landing of Dutch William. Of course the Spanish did not land, but they would have done so but for that favoring storm which blew them from our coasts. Ah, yes says the sceptical reader, but how about 1788—what happened then? Well, nothing in particular; the professor confesses it. But in 1796 French troops sailed for Ireland, in 1798 they landed there, and from 1800 to 1805 our danger from invasion was greater than it had been in the days either of the armada or of La Hogue. These facts seem to suggest that every hundred years or thereabouts, England becomes subject to catastrophe from without. We are now in the presence of another eighty eight, and the professor asks whether another period of convulsions is due. We are now, he says, very much in that position which Spain occupied in 1588. In that year, and in the next two eighty-eights, our islands were threatened; in 1888 it is not Great Britain but Greater Britain which is exposed to attack. We have, as Spain had an empire which is to be found everywhere, and which is proportionately liable is it to the attention of an enemy's fleet; while England itself has reason to be anxious about its food supply from abroad. Such considerations are not precisely novel; but it is interesting to observe that Mr. Seely, whose professorship is not of politics, is as earnest as any politican could be in his exhortation to Englishmen not to pooh-pooh possible calamities, but look things full in the face and to be "ready in time."

The propellor Starrucca, of Buffalo went ashore in a heavy fog about three miles west of two Harbors on Lake Superior. The tug Ella G. Stone, went to her relief and succeeded in releasing her. She started for Duluth leaking quite badly. The steam barge May Durr, of Milwaukee, with the schooner Halstead of Chicago and barge Oak of Bayfield in tow went ashore in a heavy fog three miles west of the same place. The schooner Halstead struck and is looking quite badly. The Oak saved herself from grounding. The tug Stone went to the assistance of the Durr and released her. The three boats were loaded with ties. The Durr threw off about two thousand ties from her deck.

A General Tie-up.

of all the means of public conveyance in a large city, even for a few hours, during a strike of the employes, means a general paralyzing of trade and industry for the time being, and is attended with an enormous aggregate loss to the community. How much more serious to the individual is the general tie-up of his system, known as constipation, and due to the strike of the most important organs for more prudent treatment and better care. If too long neglected, a torpid or sluggish liver will produce serious forms of kidney and liver diseases, malarial trouble and chronic dyspepsia. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets are a preventive and cure of these disorders. They are prompt, sure and effective, pleasant to take, and positively harmless.

A HAND.

As Small as a Child's, as Soft as Velvet, and Owned by a Darling Little Woman.

I am a sound sleeper. With a clear conscience and a robust constitution, it is impossible for a man to toss sleeplessly on his bed. But that morning I awoke suddenly two hours before my usual time, and felt so wide awake that I thought it must certainly be 7 o'clock at the latest. I pulled aside the curtains of my berth and held my watch under the glimmering light. It was only 5! I shook it, looked again at it and glanced up and down the car. No one was stirring; not even the porter in sight. I pulled my head in again, shivered a little, turned over and tried to go to sleep, but the pillows seemed out of shape and I could not comfortably arrange them. The covering would not adjust itself to me, and after trying to keep my eyes shut a few minutes, at last gave it up and rolled up the curtain.

The air outside looked keen and snapping. The ground with its covering of snow sparkled as if some prodigal hand had scattered diamonds in profusion everywhere. The moon was low, but seemed to be lingering for one last look on so beautiful a landscape. Away ahead I could occasionally catch glimpses of the engine as she rounded the curves, covered with clouds of smoke that fell back over her dusky form like a mantle of eider. She held her nose over the glistening path, with its two parallel lines running into infinity, like a hound on the trail, while the light on her forehead darted flashes like a meteor. On we flew. The low rumble and swaying motion of the car on its springs betokened our speed.

I lay back on my pillow thanking fortune that I was in comfortable quarters and not breathing the frosty airs as the men on the engine. As dawn appeared I pulled up the curtain at the foot of the berth, piled the pillows under my head, making my position a semi-reclining one, and watched the effect of the bright streaks of crimson which were now shooting over the hills and making the shadows in the valleys disappear.

On entering the car the evening before, as far as I could notice, the apartments were nearly all filled. Seeing this, I gave my valise and coat to the porter, entered the smoking apartment and did not leave it until late—so late in fact that it was almost impossible to find my berth, owing to the poor light and the uniformity of the made-up berths.

I now noticed as I raised the lower curtian, in the half light of morning that filled my apartment, a white object at the upper inside corner of the berth, to which I at first gave no attention, thinking, as I remember now, that it was the corner of the sheet that covered the berth above me. At one time I saw it move, but the movement was so unatural for an inanimate object that it gave me a slight start. As the light increased I found my attention was all the more keenly riveted on this white object in the corner. I saw it move a second time and by degrees it began to take shape. I now discovered that it was a hand, but whether a large or a small one, a man's or a woman's, I could not discern. I was pleased at making the one discovery—a little more daylight would tell me what kind of a hand it was and give me some idea of its owner.

I found out as my vision became plainer that it was small—probably a child's. Next, that it was too slender for a child's and not large enough for a man's. A slight movement of the hand betrayed a beautiful solitaire ring encircling the third finger—my interest very perceptibly increased. I thought I was too old to be interested in such things. When a man looks over a stretch of thirty years, and can honestly confess that such trivial things as to be interested seriously in a woman's heart never troubled him, he should not confess that in the secondary consideration he should be taken so completely unawares by a woman's hand. I wished my bed had been made up the other way, then I would be directly under the little hand and could study it from a distance, to be sure, but more minutely.

The light grew in volume, but not fast enough to suit my impatience. I watched the hand as it hung there, limp and motionless, with increasing interest. I was fearful every moment it might be withdrawn. I sat up in my berth, but my view was not sufficiently compensated. I tossed my pillow to the other end of the berth and changed my position. A closer view of the hand showed me also a wee bit of well rounded wrist protruding from a black sleeve trimmed with lace. The hand was a beautiful one, small, pearly white, and looked as soft as a baby's. The veins were marked only the faintest under the almost transparent skin. The nails were beautiful, well rounded, daintily kept and polished. My inquisitiveness would not stop where the hand left off. I was not now satisfied with the closer inspection I had obtained, but wanted to know if the owner of the hand was as comely in person as the little sample I had of her led me to believe was the case. I argued that such a white skin must belong to a fair complexioned lady; a brunette's would be creamy in color. I, of course, wondered how old she was—I could not see a wrinkle—she must be young. Was she married or single? I never gave much of any attention to the ring fashions, but I knew that a young lady was at least engaged if she wore a ring on her first finger. It gave me pleasure to know the ring did not betoken a sweetheart. Had the ring been placed on the second finger she must have been a maried lady, but then, if married, where was the plain band wedding ring? It was wanting. The ring being on the third finger did not argue anything. I next tried to recall all that I had ever heard in regard to palmistry. I had given the matter some little attention years before and could only recalled the cardinal signs. The hand was partially closed; this was against me, but by twisting my neck I found the hand was clearly marked with dainty lines, which I could now see but indistinctly. The line that is first considered is the line running around and encircling the base of the thumb, called the vital line, if I remember correctly. The line was so marked that it betokened a good constitution and a fair lease of life. Its course was nearer the base of the thumb than is usual, showing her to be of a warm, confiding nature, firm, but sympathetic. Some other lines showed a love of independence, and sound judgment; others, a coquettish, roguish nature; others that she was tender of other's feelings. This much I found: That I was unconsciously taking as much interest in the "tale of the hand" as if I expected my own hand to be crossed with a silver piece when I had finished the examination. A few markings in the center of the hand I desired to see, that the half light in the apartment did not reveal. I never knew how it happened, but can only remember that I was so earnest in my endeavor to trace out those markings that I forgot the hand belonged to any one—forgot where I was, or the situation, and turned the hand around to the light.

I noticed that my story was not much appreciated by my audience. This was made very evident by an occasional yawn from some of the members of the party, or from their changing their positions occasionally. I did not desire to bore them with a story that I myself thought insipid, and as I closed the last sentence said:

"I see you are not interested and we are all tired, let us postpone the balance of the story until to-morrow night."

"No, no; go on!" said Madge. "It is just beginning to get interesting. What did she do when you caught hold of her hand?"

The moment my hand came in contact with the hand from above I realized my mistake. The hand was suddenly withdrawn. An overwhelming sense of my folly came over me. I would apologize, but how? I could not say it was an accident, because I had taken hold of the hand deliberately. Had I merely touched it that would have been another matter. I did hope at that moment a collision would happen, that in the uproar I could drop out into the snow unobserved. With a feeling somewhat akin to criminal, I dressed quickly, secured my valise and coat, and placed them in a seat not occupied further up the car, and then went into the washroom. Not until I reached it did I feel secure. I plunged my burning face into the cold water, which animated me a little. As I gathered my scattered forces while completing my morning toilet. I smiled at my sudden trepidation. I had not been seen; why not go back and from another seat see if the owner of the hand was as comely as I had pictured her? There were twenty other persons in the car; how could she distinguish me from the others?

I went back into the car and took a seat near my own berth and waited patiently for the occupant of upper "seven" to make her appearance. After a lapse of time that seemed hours, while in reality it may have been twenty minutes, I saw the porter approach the berth with the ladder, and immediately a girlish head protrudhd from the curtains with a half-frightened expression on her face. What I expected from so beautiful a hand was more than realized. The face was beautiful—large, lustrous eyes, a beautiful complexion, and a well-formed head crowned with a luxuriant growth of auburn hair. As the curtains parted and she stood for an instant, not quite determined which way to go, I caught her full outline. She was medium in size, graceful in every movement, and was clothed in a warm colored fabric which heightened the color of her complexion. As she passed me I imagined I caught a little roguish twinkle in her eye—but that may have been only my imagination. I waited patiently for her return, but my station, Hudson, was called ere she came back and I reluctantly got off.

The beautiful little town nestled so quietly under the lee of the great black St. Croix bathing its feet, is as beautiful in winter as in summer months. As I left the car and stepped into the cold, invigorating air, I could not but admire the quiet tranquility that reigned everywhere. The blue smoke was curling upward from a number of white cottage chimneys that betokened warmth, peace and plenty inside. I dropped my valise at the depot and walked aimlessly down the high grade approach of the immense bridge. I indulged in some aircastle building that was the nearest approach to sentimentalism that had occupied my thoughts for many a day. The long train, now rumbling along the further end of the bridge, and so far distant that it resembled a toy train of cars, contained a face and form that had awakened a new desire in me. A little white cottage in some quiet place like this, a wife, and mayhap a little toddler at my knee—but nonsense. I started back at a rapid rate, breakfasted, finished my business and took the next train for St. Paul.

It was the time of the ice carnival. Such a throng of people in outlandish costumes. At night the city was gaily illumined with myriads of electric lights and its streets filled with noisy, rollicking, gaily dressed crowds. I hurried through my business, which kept me occupied for several days and then, being alone and having no personal acquaintances in the city, did as the rest did—bought a blanket suit, a tasseled cap and followed the crowd. I was not willing to admit then, even to myself, why I staid, as I took no particular interest in tobogganing, or freezing myself standing on the corners watching the various carnival companies in their parades. But you can guess it. On the third day I was rewarded. I was coming down Third street; the sidewalk was filled with pedestrians, while the street was in a continual jingle of passing sleighs loaded with happy people. One turnout that attracted my attention was remarkably fine. Three large horses were hitched abreast, a semi-circle of plumes over the central horse, while the others were nearly covered with bells. The heavy harnesses were trapped with silver. The sleigh was low and broad, hidden with robes, while the driver, on a high seat in front, was costumed like a Cossack. There were two occupants beside the driver—an old gentleman and a lady. The gentleman was so closely muffled that he was nearly unrecognizable, but the lady was the one that had occupied upper "seven." She saw me, I think, before I recognized her. As the sleigh passed me and was receding, she pulled her mittened hand from her muff and held it up, palm toward me, for an instant, behind the old gentleman, and seemingly trying to avoid being seen by others or the old gentleman himself. There was a most tantalizing and bewitching expression on her face as she did this. In an instant the face was gone.

To say that I was dumbfounded at her action would be hardly expressing my feelings. That she knew or devined my efforts at palmistry in the car was certain from her action. That she was amused at my nonplussed expression was evident from the suppressed mirth, the fun, raillery and blushes which followed like quick ripples over her face. To my embarassment she had turned the tables on me. The twinkle that I thought I saw in her eyes as she passed me that morning in the car was not supposition. It was a reality.

I made my way to my hotel and took the first train home. On my way to the depot I was afraid to look into a woman's face, fearing that it might be she and that some new phase of the matter might reveal itself that I knew nothing about or did not expect. The matter puzzled me for a long time, but I never could come to any real opinion of how she obtained the knowledge of my efforts at palmistry.

When I entered Mme. Y's residence the night of her famous reception, unattended, the house was ablaze with light. The parlors and halls were crowded with guests, while the dancers in the saloon were making muscular efforts to keep in motion, though nearly futile for want of space. My acquaintance was limited, and after disposing of my wraps I was happy that such was the case. I could get into a corner somewhere and watch what was going on unobserved. I had scarcely reached the lower landing when I was confronted by an old classmate that I had not seen for years. His delight at meeting me was not assumed and nothing would do but that I must make the rounds with him. Almost before I was aware of it I was filling my card with names.

I spent a most enjoyable evening. I closed my last number and was standing in the conservatory, which opened from the drawingroom, talking with Brown, my old college chum, when my attention was attracted to a graceful figure standing at the further end of the drawing-room conversing with an elderly gentleman. Occasionally she would look in our direction, artlessly shading her eyes with her hand to get a better view of us. There was something familiar to me in the figures of both the gentleman and the young lady. I probably stared so earnestly that Brown, noting my lack of attention, turned, and seeing the object that attracted me, said:

"That's the princess, Jim. They have come in late, and that is her father, Senator X. Come along. I'll introduce you."

I tried to remonstrate, but it was useless. The minute I saw her face, unaffected by the blaze of light, I recognized her. I am not usually timid, but I never felt so ill at ease or awkward as I did at that time. She saw my embarrassment and only added to it by saying:

"Yes, Mr. Brown. Mr Daly comes very near being an old friend; so much so, in fact, that we should shake hands."

And as she said this she coquetishly thrust forward the little gloven hand, which I clasped with a vigor that was quite unnecessary. The conversation branched off into various channels. I stumbled along and wished I could get away from those eyes. Finding that Brown was in the middle of a discussion with the Senator, I told her I had something to tell her, and she very cordially took my arm and we wandered back to the conservatory, now quite deserted. I then explained the ridiculous experience of the sleeping-car—how I was led into it, and my succeeding rudeness when I thought I was not known. She laughed heartily and said the occurrence had been often amusingly thought of. She explained that in her sleep her arm had fallen over the side of the berth and she was awakened by a feeling of numbness in her hand, owing to the position her arm was held in for so long. She had no idea her hand extended below the line of the upper berth. Her attention was further attracted by a low voice in the berth beneath, and on looking down had seen the hand of a rather "prepossessing looking gentleman," as she put it, in close proximity to her hand, and seemingly studying it very minutely. She knew at once what his motive was, and still more so, because the gentleman was talking either to himself or to some one in the berth with him. (I have been told before that I was in the habit of talking to myself. It only confirmed me of the uselessness of trying to throw off bachelorhood.) On pressing her to know what it was I said, she replied that she had only caught enough of the conversation to hear him speaking about the "Vital line," the "Line of truth," and so on. She also said she caught the expression of earnest endeavor on his face, and knew that the accident happened unintentionally. When seeing me again in St. Paul she could not refrain from giving me to understand she knew all about it, and begged that I would forgive her rudeness and make allowances for a little breach of etiquette, because it was "Carnival time."

Further conversation was interrupted by the approach of Brown and Senator X. The Senator said:

"I am looking for a man by your name Daly. I noticed by the papers he was in Washington a few days ago. He is here to introduce a new piece of ordnance he has patented. I did want to see him. I have an idea of my own that will perfect this machine. I think."

"Why, Jim, that is you," said Brown, "Senator; this is the Daly."

"Well, just the man I wanted! Mr. Daly, your patent—I have seen the drawings—is lacking in this, that the ——"

"Now, papa, do not commence talking gun to Mr. Daly. You will never know when to stop. Let me suggest that Mr. Daly call."

"Yes, dear, you are right, and its late, too—but, Mr. Daly, can you not join us at breakfast. We will be alone, will we not, dear?"

"Breakfasts are too conventional, papa, and perhaps it would be inconvenient for Mr. Daly to breakfast at our hour; let me suggest dinner. You will come, Mr. Daly, and you also, Mr. Brown?"

Brown pleaded an engagement, but I accepted

"Yes, dinner—that is better," said the Senator. "I will in the meantime get my ideas on paper about the gun, Daly; and come early. We dine at 7." And giving his number for his carriage, they bade us good night.

That night, just before we parted, Brown said abruptly:

"So you and the princess are old friends, Jim?"

"How does she come by that name?"

"Oh, that is the name she is known by among her gentleman friends, and that is the name given her by the papers here. She is so well liked, and is such a regal-looking beauty—did you ever see such eyes and hair? She reminds me—

'Her eyes were blue, and such a pair,
No star in heaven was ever brighter;
Her skin was most divinely fair;
I never saw a shoulder whiter.
And there was something in her form—
Juste en bon pointe, I think they term it—
That really was enough to warm
The icy bosom of a hermit.'

She has more admirers than any other woman in Washington, and treats us all about the same, but she is 'still heart and fancy free.'"

"Then you are an admirer, I should take it?"

"Yes I was one of them, but now I admire from a distance. Where did you say you met her, Jim? You did not seem a bit impressed with her cordiality."

"Eh, ha! Good night," and Brown left me.

I sauntered slowly toward my lodgings; the bright moonlight and the utter quiet were restful. The cigar I smoked was a good one, but my mind was so busy in recalling her every word and expression during our short conversation that it went out half a dozen times I was restless that night. I closed my eyes and could see the little white hand as I first saw it in the half light of early morning in my berth. I could see it in its little silk mitten, held up toward me from the sleigh. I could feel it, with its gloved warmth, lying carelessly in mine, and then, as I gradually became unconscious, it seemed to hang over me, and as I would grasp it, it would vanish just out of my reach. I, too, was becoming one of "princess's" admirers.

The dinner next evening was a charming experience—just her father and herself. Her father, the Senator, was, I found, an old friend of my fathers in their younger days. When we arose from the table and the Senator led the way into the library, or his den, as he termed it, she begged to be allowed to follow us, and over perplexing details and seemingly uninteresting designs to her, we spent the evening. In comment on the idea of her's that explained a certain perplexity we were worrying over, her father said:

"Well, now, daughter, you know more about guns than either of us. You see, Mr. Daly, it's hereditary."

Before I left she sang several charming little ballads, "favorites of papa's," she said, and I went back to my lodgings in love with the "princess."

The next day and the next saw me at the Senators. Occasionally I would catch a glimpse of Cassie as she flitted past or through the library, where the Senator and myself were busily engaged over our drawings. Sometimes she would stop and listen to our discussions. It was then that designs, ideas and details would vanish and leave me in such an absent-minded state that it would be some minutes after she had left use before I could again collect myself enough to proceed.

Much to my pleasure I found that my work was being lengthened out beyond all my former calculations. After plans had been placed on file I had no reasonable excuse for staying. The last evening in Washington I called, with the full intention of telling Cassie some things her ear alone should hear. I found myself in a semi-reception when I reached the Senator's, and had only a few minutes with her to say good-bye. The Senator said he was sorry to lose me, as I had been the only sociable friend of the winter.

I heard from the Senator occasionally during the following summer on business topics, and his daughter, but only as to her health or some such matter. In the following September I saw a newspaper announcement of the engagement of Miss X., daughter of Senator X., of St. Paul, to Lieut. S. A. Somers, U. S. N. It made me shiver a little. I laid down the paper, and through the curling smoke of my pipe saw a slender white hand form itself and gradually grow dim and vanish in the shadows beyond the range of my lamp. I chided myself that I had let my love lie dormant all this time and had not even made a fair race for that which I desired above all things. Now it was out of my reach.

The latter part of the next January found me again at St. Paul during the carnival. The day after my arrival, returning to the hotel for dinner, I found a note from Senator X., saying he had seen an announcement in the Globe of my arrival, and insisted that I should have my things sent up to his house and make his home my own during my stay; and further explaining that they had been home for some weeks and would not again return to Washington that season. I called that afternoon and was met by Cassie, who had been apprised by her father of his invitation. She seemed embarressed at our first greeting, but it soon wore away and I found her even more beautiful and kind than ever before. When the Senator arrived he seemed delighted to see me, and at dinner was in one of his merriest moods. That evening a few of their friends came in and Cassie sang for us. Late that night the Senator and myself talked over the ordinance bill that had passed the previous spring so favorable to myself, and planning new moves necessary for its general introduction into the navy. That suggested a matter of painful recollection to me and I said:

"I saw an announcement last fall, Senator, that you were to have a member of our navy as a son-in-law."

"Where did you hear that? You mean Sumner? No; that was only a little newspaper gossip."

I could have hugged the old gentleman. I mentioned that was where I had seen it—in some newspaper.

"No, Daly; the right man has not come along yet. She is a jewel for some man, but since her mother's death the thought of her leaving mo is painful, but sooner or later, it is bound to come."

The following afternoon a sleigh-ride was proposed by Cassie. The Senator had said at lunch that he would not be back until late.

On entering the sleigh I noticed it to be the same one that I had seen on that memorable occasion the year before. Our ride was delightful in itself, but I think we were both ill at ease. By some lucky intuition we again passed the spot where I had first seen the sleigh and the little mittened hand thrust out before me. Glancing nervously at Cassie I noticed a slight tinge of crimson on her face. She laid her hand coyly on my arm and the tinge deepened as she said:

"It was here I treated you very unkindly a year ago."

"You held it toward me then—and now, darling, will you not give it to me to keep forever?"

And as I clasped the little hand in mine, it laid there a willing prisoner, and her tears told me a story far more delicious than I ever wildly dreamed of.—James Daly, in the Little Blind God on Rails.

A B-a-d Man

Texas Siftings: He called himself Rattlesnake Bill, and looked as if the might be a bad man to handle. He was up for drunkenness.

"Do you plead guilty or not guilty?" asked the Austin justice before whom he was being tried.

"You don't try a man before the inquests are held, do you? Don't you take me around first to the undertaker's shop to identify the remains? That is what I have been accustom to do in Colorado. I am alway asked to identify my corpses."

"What remains? What inquests?" asked the recorder.

"The mangled remains of the policeman who tried to arrest me," said the desperado.

"You are laboring under some hallucination, my friend," remarked the recorder. "You didn't kill any policeman last night."

"Then he isn't dead yet. Take me to the hospital, where his life is ebbing away. In Colorado I'm known as the Jumpin' Jimplecute that chews up railroad iron an' they allers take me to the bedside of the dying policeman who has tried to arrest me, so that he can identify me as the cyclone that devastated him. Have you taken the ante-mortem of the policeman I partially destroyed last night?"

"I don't know what you are talking about," said the justice. "You were arrested and brought to the lockup by a little stick of a tailor, who couldn't sleep on account of the racket you made."

"So I was arrested by a civilian, was I? Oh, well, that's all right. At first I was afraid I had digraced myself. I was afraid I had allowed a squad of policemen to arrest me. Any citizen can arrest me with impunity. Civilians are beneath my resentment. A civilian can kick the Ghoul from Ghoulville, who picks pieces of men from between his teeth after he has breakfasted, and I'll not lay my hand on him. You can't make me fight an ordinary citizen. It's the officers of law I'm after. When I want a fight I want some two or three policemen to tackle me as an inducement. It takes five able-bodied policemen to make it interesting enough for me to let myself out. I never fish for sardines."

Details of the Ichthyosaurus Find.

A Yeovil correspondent of the London Standard writes: "A discovery of great interest to both the geologist and the student of natural history has just been made in South Somerset. Last week while some laborers were excavating a pit of blue lias on the Manor farm, Tintinhull near Yeovil, they came across a truly magnificent fossil of the ichthyosaurus. From the snout to the end of the vertebra the length was more than twenty-two feet, and the jaw, which was furnished with large conical teeth, was nearly three feet long. Three out of the four 'paddles' with which the animal propelled itself were very distinct, and all its other structural peculiarities were fully develloped in the fossil. Unfortunately, when the clay surrounding it was loosened, the fossil fell to pieces, although one of its most powerful 'paddles' (measuring about thirty-four inches long) was preserved intact. All the fragments, which filled several tubs, were preserved by Mr. Penny, the occupier of the farm, and no doubt an expert in ichthyology would have no difficulty in fitting them together. The spot on which this interesting fossil was found is situated about midway between the Bristol and English channels (about twenty-five miles from each, as the crow would fly,) and about two miles from the present bed of the river Parrett, which flows into the British channel."

Dangers of Doing Good.

American Dame—Is it possible? And so you have perfected inventions to do everything by electricity, making everybody rich and turning the earth into a paradise?

American Inventor—Not only have I conquered the earth but the air also. We wish to be in Paris or London; all we need to do is to touch a button and we glide on electric wings to our destination. All the luxuries of the rich will become the every day portion of the poor, in fact there need be no rich, no poor, since every desire of the human heart will be as free as air. Electrical machinery working automatically will turn the whole planet into one vast caravansary, of which we will be the luxuriously accommodated guests. The raising and preparation of food, the making of clothing, the building of palaces, every species of effort will be supplanted by the ceaseless work of automatic mechanism, and half an hour's exertion a day will make every beggar a Vanderbilt."

Isn't it glorious! Are the plans all finished?"

"Years ago."

"Years ago! Mercy on us! What under the sun are you waiting for?"

"I am naturally very sensitive, and am waiting for the time when the inventor can benefit his fellowmen without being called an octopus and soulless monopolist."—Omaha World.

A Start.

So you want to borrow $500 to start on? "If you only had $500 capital you have a chance now to establish a business that will grow into thousands and perhaps millions, eh?" All you need is the start, is it? Well, my son, I don't know about investing $500 in you until you have invested something in yourself. I want to see you trot one heat, anyhow, before I decide whether you are safe to back. Listen to me, my son the man who can make a $500 business grow into thousands, and perhaps millions, always gets the $500. Always. Here, I'll tell you what I'll do with you. I'll give you a dollar. Now, a man who can make millions out of 500, can easily make 500 out of one. Good-by. Don't work too hard.

THEY TOOK HIM IN.

How Two Hardy Miners Dealt With a Little Chap With Eyeglasses and a Hard Hat.

From the Denver Republican.

The speaker was a tall, broad-shouldered man of 60 years of age. His long, luxuriant beard had once been a bright, sandy color, but was now liberally streaked with gray. His face was bronzed and wrinkled, but his form was erect and there was a clear, bright look in his eyes, which showed him to be in perfect health and likely to resist the attacks of Father Time for many years more.

His hands were large and brown and in places calloused by work. His clothing was of the "hand-me-down" variety, and did not fit him very well, but vanity was not one of the old man's failings. He was not perfectly at ease in his new suit, however, and his actions indicated that he would much prefer being attired in his old suit of "ducking" with his pants in his boots.

He wore a blue shirt—no amount of persuasion could have induced him to put on a "biled" shirt—and smoked a pipe. The latter was his dearest companion and his source of comfort in all troubles; he detested a cigar.

In the mountains he was known to his intimate acquaintances as "Uncle Billy"—few of them knew his surname: to others he was known as "the old prospector."

For years he had searched the mountains for precious metals; he had traced "float" for miles to discover its source; he had "panned" the placer grounds along a hundred mountain streams; fortune seemed against him, and the result of his labor had simply been enough to provide him with food and clothes. He had lived a life of exposure and privation, far from civilization, and for many years had nothing to show as the fruit of his labor.

About a year ago his luck changed and fortune favored him—but we will let him tell his story in his own way.

"A year ago last spring," said Uncle Billy, when he had filled and lighted his pipe and settled himself comfortably in an armchair, "I was prospectin' in San Juan country. I had been over in ther Ten-Mile ther year before, but I didn't seem ter have no luck 't all, Old Jim Martin, who was down in the San Juan, writ me a letter to come down ther, as things were lookin' purty good.

"Well—sir—I—went—down—thar," continued Uncle Billy, alternating each word with a puff from his pipe, "an' I went up to ole Jim's claim. He called the claim the 'Mary Jane,' arter a gal back East he uster be sweet on, but she married another feller, an' that's one reason why ole Jim come 'cross the plains; but he was allers kinder gone on the gal ever since."

"Did he have a good claim?"

"Kinder. He thought he had struck it big."

"'What yer got, Jim?' sez I."

"'I've got the lime and porphyry,' sez he; 'what more do I want?' sez Jim."

"'Wa-al, sez I,' kinder slow like, 'seems to me a little mineral would help it along a bit,' and then I laughed at him, and purty soon Jim commenced laughin', too.

"'That's so,' sez Jim, 'but when yer git the lime and porphyry you're sure to get the mineral after a while.'

"The next mornin' I took my pick and struck out. I hadn't gone far before I picked up a piece of float rock.

"I looked right up ahead of me, whar thar was a sharp ledge of rocks. 'That's whar she comes from,' sez I to myself.

"After selecting a location I started in."

"Did you strike it?"

"Not right away. I worked for about three weeks without gettin' anything; then a little streak of mineral came in; it wasn't a very big streak, but it looked rich. Jim was working on the Mary Jane, just below me. I hollered to him; 'Jim I've struck it!'

"Jim come up, got out his glasses and examined it. 'We've got it, pard,' says he; 'gray copper and native silver. We've got a bonanzy,' sez Jim.

"'I don't know what a bonanzy is, Jim,' sez I, 'but if it's anything good I hope you're right.'

"We got a windlass and commenced work in dead earnest. We sunk her forty feet and then got scared.'

"What scared you?"

"Why, the durned old thing commenced to pinch out. 'Jim,' sez I, one mornin,' 'what do you think of the Bonanzy now?' We had named the claim the Bonanzy.

"We commenced to blow about what a big mine we had, and purty soon we had the whole neighborhood talking about it. Early in the spring a little chap with eyeglasses and a hard hat came into camp. He wore boots laced up in front and a corduroy suit. The boys spotted him for an expert. He said he was representin' St. Louis moneyed men and was lookin' for a mine.

"'Billy,' sez Jim to me one day when we was talkin' about the expert 'let's take him in.'

"'How?' sez I.

"'Let's sell him the Bonanzy; I don't think he knows a mine from a post hole.'

"To make a long story short," said Uncle Billy, "we took him in, $20,000 in good money. By George!" exclaimed the old man, growing excited at the awakened memory of the transaction "but me and Jim felt good."

"You did take him in, sure enough," said the reporter, unconsciously rejoicing at the old man's good luck.

"I'll tell you the balance of the story about that mine and you can judge for yourself who got took in. That feller knew more in a minit than me an' Jim both put together did in a year. He went back East and got three other fellers in with him—big bugs.

"They took that ole 40-foot hole, put up a shaft house, put in machinery and set a gang of men to work. They called themselves the 'Bonanza Gold & Silver Consolidated Minin' and Millin' Company.' They issued stock. The little fellow with the corduroy suit an' eye-glasses was Superintendent. Purty soon they made a strike; then they built a mill, then they declared a dividend. You couldn't touch that mine now with $2,000,000; no siree.

"Jim and me never talk about the ole Bonanzy now. One day I said to him: 'Jim, I see the ole Bonanzy output another dividend yesterday.' He looked at me kinder sad like and said: 'Billy, me and you are two derned old fools; let's go take somethin'.'"

Done in a Minute.

Cleveland Press.

"Well, well, don't fret; I'll be there in a minute."

But, my friend, a minute means a good deal, notwithstanding you affect to hold it of no consequence. Did you ever stop to think what may happen in a minute? No. Well, while you are murdering a minute for yourself and one for me, before you get ready to sit down to the business we have in hand, I will amuse you by telling you some things that will happen meantime.

In a minute we shall be whirled around on the outside of the earth by its diurnal motion a distance of 13 miles. At the same time we shall have gone along with the earth, in its grand journey around the sun, 1,080 miles. Pretty quick traveling you say? Why, that is slow work compared with the rate of travel of that ray of light which just now reflected from that mirror made you wink. A minute ago that ray was 11,160,000 miles away.

In a minute, over all the world, about eighty new-born infants have each reached a wall of protest at the fates for thrusting existence upon them, while as many more human beings, weary with the struggle of life, have opened their lips to utter their last sign.

In a minute the lowest sound your ear can catch has been made by 990 vibrations, while the highest tone reached you after making 2,228,000 vibrations.

In a minute an express train goes a mile and a Cleveland street car 32 rods; the fastest trotting horse, 147 9-13 rods, and an average pedestrian of the genius homo has got over 16 rods.

In each minute in the United States, night and day, all the year round, twenty-four barrels of beer have to go down 12,096 throats, and 4,830 bushels of grain have come to bin.

If there were a box kept at the city hall in the city of Cleveland into which every minute a sum sufficient to pay the interest on the city debt had to be dropped, the sum so dropped each minute of the whole year would be $7 cents.

How about national finances? Well, sir, in the same way, each minute, night and day, by the official reports for the year 1886, the United States collected $639 and spent $461; $178 more than necessary. The interest on the public debt was $96 a minute, or just exactly equal to the amount of silver mined in that time.

Now, in the residue of figures I give, you will remember that they represent so much for every minute in the year. All the preceding figures should be so considered. And remember, also, that we are all the time, hereafter, talking about facts connected with the whole United States.

The telephone is used 595 times, the telegraph 196 times. Of tobacco, 925 pounds are raised, and part of it has been used in making 6,673 cigars, and some more of it has gone up in the smoke of 2,292 cigarettes.

But I am afraid that you will forget that we are talking about a minute, sixty seconds of time. No? Well, then, every minute 600 pounds of wool grow in this country, and we have to dig sixty-one tons of anthracite coal and 200 tons of bituminous coal, while of pig iron we turn out 12 tons and of steel rails three tons.

In this minute you have kept me waiting fifteen kegs of nails have been made, twelve bails of cotton from the fields and thirty-six bushels of grain gone into 149 gallons of spirits, while $66 in gold should have been dug out of the earth. In the same time the United States mint turned out coin and silver coin to the value of $121, and forty-two acres of the public domain have been sold or given away.

WITHIN AN ACE.

A War Correspondent's Narrow Escape from Death.

"At the capitulation of Paris the correspondents were eager to get into that unlucky city and send a description to their papers," writes Archibald Forbes. "This was a somewhat dangerous undertaking. The morning after the capitulation I secured a pass through the German lines and walked into the city all well. Words cannot describe the condition of things. I carried in my wallet five pounds of ham which formed the first provisions that were sent in. Inet some of my colleagues there who had been shut in during the siege. They were dining on dog soup and horse steak, and were eating a peculiar looking stuff, called bread, which was made chiefly of sawdust and sand. The horse steak was not bad. It had an odd sweet taste with it, but one has to become accustomed to it to like it. The dog soup I did not try. The difficulty then was to get the news to London. Telegraphing was strictly prohibited in France, so I rode hard for about 20 miles to a railroad station that took the train to Strasbourg; from there I went to Carlsbad and sent off my dispatches. I then returned to Paris, having accomplished a journey of 700 miles in 48 hours. On re-entering Paris, I met several of my colleagues, who chaffed me considerably on their having been in the capital first and sent off their dispatches. I said nothing, but a few days later they were very quiet when they saw the Daily News with the news two days ahead of their dispatches. After the capitulation followed the awful days of the Commune, when, as M. Labouchere put it, 'they shot you first and apologized to your body afterwards.' One day I had the misfortune to be set upon by an excited mob who took me for a German spy. I fought as long as I could, but finally fell down. The ruffians then danced a sort of a war dance around me, kicking my head as they passed. I was just becoming unconscious when a body of police rescued me and I was locked up. Next day I was taken before a magistrate, and on showing him my British passport I was released, fortunately without any broken bones. On another occasoin I was taken prisoner and along with several others stood against a wall to be shot. The order had been given to present when an officer recognized me and I was released."

The Times man still continues to hammer away at Mr. Comstock, trying to kill him off, and for what purpose? Why, simply and solely because it wants to see a democrat elected. The interests of every one of the Times' patrons demand a man from this locality to open that vast pine reserve the Red Lake Indian Reservation—a man of sufficient ability and legislative experience to accomplish the work. Such a man Mr. Comstock is confessed to be by both democrats and republicans, and further-more a Crookston man could not and would not serve our interests in this particular better and yet the Times man would if he could sacrifice Mr. Comstock and the hopes of this people on the party altar. The Times quotes articles from its democratic exchanges in the effort to show that Mr. C. cannot be elected. One from the Review that says Clay County will not give him a majority. Neither the Review nor the Times mention the fact that every prominent democrat in Moorhead and, as far as their influence can make it, in the county will take off his coat and work for Mr. Comstock, until election day and then vote for him. The prohibitionists feel the same way. Again the Times notes that the Herald says that Norman County will not go for Comstock. Well, nobody expected the republican party would carry Norman this fall anyhow, but we will wager our good faber that Mr. Comstock will come nearer to it than any other man not on the cold water ticket. The Times man will see the usual majority rolled up for the republican candidate in the Fifth if, indeed it be not grater.

The Republican Platform.

The Republican platform, in the main, is a good strong one, clear and out-spoken containing no ambiguous language subject to misinterpretation but the party has made two bad mistakes which are liable to cause it some trouble. It has not recognized the fact that there is a great and growing demand upon it for some decided action upon the liquor question, and herein makes a very serious blunder. While it recognizes the right of protection to the very humblest of American citizens in all of his rights it does not hear the cry that is going up from the lips of thousands who feel the power of the demon, alcohol, nor try to extend the protecting power of the government to them. In this particular it errs and errs greatly. Again it does not sufficiently recognize the fact that the poor and the needy of the land cry out loudly against he high tariff and that the principles of the repualican party, while declaring for protection, do not contemplate and never did an excessive high tariff like the present to accomplish the end sought. It would seem as though the party had not been sufficiently scourged as yet to become purified and entitled to wear the victor's crown. The only consolation one can find in this case is that bad as it is in these two particulars, as a whole it is infinitely superior to the wishy-washy platform the democrats promulgated at St. Louis. It is all right on every living issue of the day except the two mentioned and as of two evils one should choose the least doubtless every republican will accept it and endeavor to make the best of it.

BOYS, NEVER SWEAR.

1. It is mean. A boy of high moral standing would almost as soon steal a sheep as swear.
2. It is vulgar—altogether too low for a decent boy.
3. It is cowardly—implying a fear of not being believed or obeyed.
4. It is ungentlemanly. A gentleman, according to Webster, is a genteel man—well bred, refined. Such a man will no more swear than go into the street to throw mud with a chimney sweep.
5. It is indecent—offensive to delicacy and extremely unfit for human ears.
6. It is foolish. "Want of decency is want of sense."
7. It is abusive—to the mind which conceived the oath, to the tongue which uttered it, and to the person at whom it is aimed.
8. It is venomous—showing a boy's heart to be a nest of vipers; and every time he swears, one of them sticks out its head.
9. It is contemptible—forfeiting the respect of all the wise and good.
10. It is wicked—violating the divine law, and provoking the displeasure of Him, who will not hold him guiltless that takes His name in vain.

Our Democratic friends should bear in mind that the laborer is made an important factor in this campaign. They will be told from now until next November that the Democratic party is the party and the only party that has done anything for the laboring man. That the Democrats are always seeking to improve the condition of the wage worker. But is this true? Hardly! There have been more strikes, more labor troubles, and more disturbances among laborers, causing loss of wages to the men and destitution among their families during the present administration than ever before in the history of the country. In every branch of industry this has been an ill-omened period. There has hardly been a single important success gained by strikers in any part of the country, or in any vocation, and the failures have been very numerous. It has also been a bad season for the Knights of Labor, which has been deserted by thousands of its members since the beginning, yet, during all these troublous times, that have brought woe and desolation to many homes, what has Democracy done to provide legislation to ameliorate the laborer's condition or settle these strikes? Absolutely nothing. Why, only the other day, when John O'Neill, the chairman of the committee on labor of the house of representatives, plead that an evening, a day or an hour be assigned for labor legislation, the Democratic house refused to grant labor even so much as a hearing, while the Republican members voted with Mr. O'Neil. But they were in the minority, and so labor was denied its rights by the members of the Democratic party. Choose ye then whom ye will serve.

Our Congressman.

Todd County Argus: The congressional convention which met at St. Cloud Tuesday reached a conclusion last evening in the nomination of S. G. Comstock, of Clay County, on the forty-fifth ballot. The delegates stood by their candidates to the last, but the break had to come. While the voters of this county preferred Barto, we can assure them that Mr. Comstock is probably the ablest man for the place that came before the convention, and our interests will be safe in his hands.

Ortonville Herald Star: This result is the best possible outcome for the welfare of the district. Mr. Comstock is admittedly the ablest man of the whole list of delegates, and his nomination is only another proof that the people can be trusted to act wisely when the candidates themselves eschew bitterness and corruption from their campaign, as has been the case in the late canvas for delegates.

Bismark Daily Tribune: Hon. S. G. Comstock, who won the congressional fight in the Fifth Minnesota disrict, is one of the pioneers of the Red River valley, a successful business man and one of the most influential and public spirited citizens of Moorhead. He has represented his district faithfully in the state legislatue and in nominating him for congress the republicans of the Fifth district have made no mistake.

Winona Republican: It is to his credit, also, that he did less by personal solicitation or canvassing to secure his nominatation than either of his leading competitors, and his candidacy, which was made unanimous, entails no bitterness of feeling—uncovers no old factional sores—but opens the way to a triumphal march to victory for both himself and the party he has been selected to represent. The republicans of the Fifth district are indeed fortunate in putting Mr. Comstock foward as the man to succeed Nelson in the house.

Minneapolis Star: The five aspirants who contested the nomination at St. Cloud were all excellent men, and the convention could not have gone much astray in making its selection. In choosing S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, the convention selected one of the very ablest of the contestants. He is a man who will fill Knute Nelson's shoes admirably, for of his election there can be little doubt. He is a man of more education and polish than Nelson, and with Nelson's experience would undoubtedly exert as much influence on legislation. His tariff views, as he now proclaims them, harmonize with those of Nelson.

We can loan money on better terms than anyone else in the valley. Money paid over the moment securities are executed. STEENERSON & MCMANUS.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

City Council Proceedings.

June 12, 1888.

Meeting called to order, President Watts in the chair. Members present, ald. Lally, Childs, Walters, Marlette, Fournet, Steenerson, Jerome, Nolan, Buhn and Jennings.

Ald. Steenerson offered the following resolution

Resolved, That the public pound for the city of Crookston, be and is hereby established and located on lot 4, block 45 townsite of Crookston, Minn., the place proposed by the pound master, Mr. Philips. Unanimously adopted.

The finance committee presented their report as follows:

To the Common Council of the city of Crookston: Gentlemen, Your committee to whom was referred the report of the treasurer and comptroller for the year ending April 1st, 1887, beg leave to report as follows:

We find the report of the treasurer is not itemized sufficiently to show data fo a report which will convey accurate information as to the different items expended during that year, the purposes for which such expenditures were made, or the sources from which the moneys were received.

We submit that the statement that a certain gross sum was received by any account, and a certain gross amount sum paid out of it, is not a full and detailed account of all receipts and expenditures as required by Sec. 5 of Chap. 3 of the city charter and neither does it give the tax payers and citizens of this community, the knowledge of the purpose to which the taxes they are called upon to pay are applied, which they are entitled to have placed within their reach,

Again, we have been unable to find vouchers for the following expenditures, although we have sought them at the hands of the treasurer, who made out this report, the present incumbent of this office, the comptroller, and the city clerk. The missing vouchers are as follows:

On Gen. Fund to amount of		$ 415 10

And we respectfully return these reports with the recommendation that the city clerk be directed to search out the missing vouchers and prepare an itemized report from them, and the reports to be submitted to this council at its next regular meeting. All of which is respectfully submitted by

MARTIN LALLY.

Moved by ald. Jennings, seconded by ald. Buhn, that the report be accepted. Carried.

Moved by ald. Jennings, seconded by ald. Childs, that the city treasurer, city comptroller and city attorney and city clerk be appointed to search for the missing vouchers and to report at the next regular meeting of the city council. Carried.

To the Common Council of the City of Crookston:

Gentlemen, Your committee, has had under consideration the amend report of the city treasurer for the year ending April 1st 1888, and find it to be a carefully itemized and carefully prepared statement of the receipts and disbursements of your treasurer, for the time specified.

We have compared it with the accompanying vouchers and find it checks correctly with them, and verifies the showing in regard to total balance of moneys on hand as given in former report to be $16098.09. We therefore recommend the report to be accepted and published as provided by law.

As was expected, the revision of the report gives a more intelligent view of the city's financial condition than was furnished by the original report, and clears up some apparent mysteries presented by it, especially in regard to the various street funds in which it was therein shown that the expenditures were largely in excess of receipts. We now find there were no expenditures on streets during the past year for which orders were drawn on the street funds, but that the expenditures in question were made in the year 1886 and that the moneys used in payment of these were borrowed from the sinking fund. This leaves the various street funds indebted to the sinking fund to this extent (see treasurers report).

That some action should be taken at the earliest possible moment to adjust this indebtedness seems to us to be very evident, from a careful perusal of the charter as well as in harmony with judicious business management.

The idea had n view when this fund was created beng that it should not be encroached upon for any other purpose than investment in safe interest bearing securities until the contingency and time for which it was created had arrived.

In the various sections of Chap. 8 of the charter, it is provided that ward funds be created for the purpose of the improvement of the streets in the various wards respectively. This so far as we have made investigation, appears not to have been done. But instead, all expenditures of this nature have been directly from the general fund.

This must inevitably have resulted in placing the burden of the expense equally upon property which has not as upon that which has been benefitted by the improvments in question, and has largely increased the amount necessary to be raised for the general fund.

We submit that this objection should hereafter be removed by a careful conformity to the charter requirements above mentioned.

By a dissection of the general expense account, we find the disbursements thereunder are as follows, to wit:

Salaries	Police	$1507 82
do	Comptroller	300 00
do	Treasurer	308 33
do	Attorney	308 33
do	Clerk	399 96
do	Assessor	246 00
do	Street Com'r.	710 00

Water & Light Water main to Stock Yards including labor and pipe		$6426 85

Tank for Water Metre		87 50
PROTECTION AGAINST FIRE.
Services of Fire Department		$649 00
Care of Fire Apparatus		271 84
Hose and Hose Cart		750 00
Streets and Bridges:
Repairing Bridges (labor and material specified)		$ 557 82
Labor on Streets (specified)		1627 87
Labor (not specified)		342 15
Lumber (uses not specified)		7652 98
Rebate on street and sidewalk taxes		109 48
MISCELLANEOUS.
Merchandise (use not specified)		637 84
Printing		502 05
Expense of elections		265 00
Ice (use not specified)		27 70
Expenses of three persons to St. to prevent division of Polk Co.		300 00
Sundry expenses		511 25
Total		$24365 67

Balance from 1886	$ 5887 17
Taxes from Co. Treasurer	7589 38
Liquor licenses	10958 55
Pool Table do	83 20
Show do	135 00
Prostitution (hush money)	240 00
Justice fines	182 11
Rebate on freight	229 20
Dog tax	80 00
Dray licenses	160 00
Total	25520 00

In regard to the above, we notice large sums have been paid for "labor," lumber and merchandise, without the uses for which they were intended being so definately specified upon the orders that we are able to classify them with a proper degree of accuracy, an omission which we deem it important to have corrected in future.

We further notice the stubs in the city clerk's order book shows orders No. 447, 448 and 449 to have been drawn for $100 each in favor of the cammittee sent to St. Paul and to be still outstanding, while the canceled other canceled orders show said committee have received their pay in full. We presume the failure to cancel these stubs is a simple omission the reason for which the data before us gives no explanation of.

We also notice many of the vouchers returned to us have not been endorsed by the payee although some of them have been endorsed by parties other than the payee.

We also notice that most of these vouchers have never been cancelled after being paid, a fact which easily makes it possible, should they fall into the hands of dishonest and unprincipled parties in this condition, to make collection of them a second time, and we would recommend that our purchasing agent be instructed to procure for the use of the treasurer a dating and cancelling stamp that no excuse for this neglect may longer exist..

All of which is respectfully submitted by

MARTIN LALLY,

The Future of Wheat.

Farm Stock and Home.

Predictions concerning the probable price of the coming crop of wheat are now being freely made, and most of them are rose-tinted. That the crop in this country will be short is now generally conceded, and many think the inevitable result will be higher prices. So sanguine are some of the prophets that they are predicting prices as high as a dollar and a half a bushel during the coming fall, while but few put the price below one dollar. We earnestly wish we could see reasonable grounds for such expectations, but candor compels us to say that we cannot We are rather inclined to the belief that with the sanguine prophets the wish is father to the thought, and that their conclusions are reached without a thorough canvas of the subject.

If the deficiency in our wheat supply proves to be so large that we will have no surplus after our own wants are supplied, then those farmers who are fortunate enough to have wheat will undoubtedly get better prices than for several years past. But the largest estimated shortage we have seen (600,000,000 bushels) will still leave us with a surplus well up to 100,000,000 bushels for export. Such are our trade conditions now, that if the surplus was reduced to 10,000,000 bushels, that comparatively trivial amount would make the price for our entire crop. The domestic price would be the world's less the cost of getting it to the world's markets. It being granted that we will have an exportable surplus, it follows that any estimate of future prices, to be reasonably correct, must be based upon the world's prospective supply, and not ours alone.

It is quite certain that the shortage in this country will not be over 40,000,000 bushels—some very careful estimates make it much less—, and it is also quite as certain that the crops of Europe India and Australia will be no less than last year, in fact, the present indications point to a much larger yield. It is thought that Russia's increase will more than make good the largest estimated decrease in the United States.

Within a few weeks past we have had unquestionable evidence of the indifference of our chief customer, England, to our wheat supply or prices, and of the world's confidence that it will produce sufficient wheat for its needs. There was a time when our wheat markets were carefully watched by the whole world, when their pulsations were reciprocated wherever bread was eaten, but this is no longer the case. During the recent speculative excitement, with its consequent "bulge" in prices here, the English demand ceased at once, Russia was sending England all she needed, and prices actually declined in Liverpool. It is unpleasant to contemplate this indifference on the part of our best customer, but nothing is to be gained by ignoring or refusing to see the exact situation.

It seems to us a foregone conclusion that we must sell our surplus at whatever price we can get, and all know that such will be the price for all consumed at home. But, after all, predictions of this character are largely guesswork; we may be mistaken in our conclusions; we sincerely hope we are.

The Farmers and the Railroads.

Special to the Dispatch.

Moorhead, June 15.—A large number of business men and farmers met Railroad Commissioners Austin, Becker and Gibbs here yesterday afternoon and talked over the matter of railroad rates. Gov. Austin made a long speech, going over all the history of railroad legislation, in the course of which he referred to some members of the Farmer's Alliance in rather unparliamentary language, even going so far as to call them cranks. Mr. Probstfield, secretary of the Moorhead Alliance, replied rather sharply, and said that the railroad commisioners should protect the intesests of the farmers instead of the farmers being compelled to hire attorneys for that purpose as suggested by Gov. Austin. The farmers then drew up and presented resolutions requiring the commissioners to compel the railroads to haul wheat from Moorhead to St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth for the uniform rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds, which they think is an equitable rate compared with that charged for transportation from these points to Chicago. They ask that this rate go into effect August 15, next, and that at the same time time a proportionate reduction be made on the transportation of cattle, sheep, hogs, horses, coal and wood.

Duluth Evening Herald: Duluth democrats have an ambition to nominate one of their number for congress. The idea is suicidal to Duluth. He cannot by any possiblity be elected and he would only capture a few republican votes from his immediate personal friends and thus reduce Duluth's representation in the next republican convention. Mr. Comstock will surely be the next congressman from this district but if Duluth is faithful to him now she can surely name his successor.

Our Congressman.

St. Cloud Journal Press: Senator Comstock in point of ability, ranks among the leading men of the Fifth district. He stands high both as a law man and a business man, and during successive terms as a member of the state legislature has borne a prominent part in shaping important legislation. During the last session he was the firm friend and supporter of the high license bill and did much to secure its passage. His official record, like his personal character, is clear and unassailable, and whatever campaign can be made against him must be on some line of public policy such as men may honestly differ on. While he resides in the extreme western part of the district there is no reason to doubt that he will represent all parts with equal faithfulness, and that he will be in every way an acceptable representative of the entire body of his constituents. Of his election, and by a large majority, there is not the shadow of a doubt. The district is strongly republican, and this is the year when republicans propose to be all on hand, to vote early and straight. Senator Comstock is entitled to a big majority and he will get it.

Sauk Rapids Sentinel: Mr. Comstock's nomination no doubt gives greater average satisfaction in the district than any other would have done. He was considered as the ablest man among the candidates, and was the second choice of the multitude, hence the difficulty of any other candidate "getting there."

St. Cloud Tribune: The Hon. S. G. Comstock is a man of ability and integrity, He has served long in the state legislative body with honor and with profit to the people. He is a self-made man who springs from the true American fountain whence has come the great men of the only free country that has ever prospered on this globe. His executive ability and grasp of public affairs fits him to assume an aggressive position on the floor of the house and there battle for the interests of this district. In his speech in the ratification meeting Wednesday evening he announced his faith in Mr. Nelson's tariff views, and that he should pursue practically the same policy and devote his attention to a persevering effort to reduce the tariff and relieve the people from unjust and unreasonable taxation. These are the sentiments that are asked for by the people of this district, and so they have their candidate nominated to suit their wishes, and they will roll up a majority which will prove their faith to their avowed principles of reform and progress.

The republican party has made no mistake this time and it is able to meet its foes girted with an impregnable armor, and with a defiant battle cry, crush to earth the enemies who attempt, by vain sophistries, to delude and lead astray a faithful and deserving people. Comstock and victory are the watchwords.

Graceville Transcript: The nomination is a good one and gives general satisfaction. Mr. Comstock has the unanimous endorsement of the Farmers Alliance of the Red River valley and the whole northern part of the district, and is well capable of representing the great empire, known as the Fifth district. The Big Stone County delegation was virtually instructed for Judge Stearns and stayed by him as long as there was any hope of success, but finally went to Comstock; he being doubtless the second choice of the late county convention

Duluth Daily News: The contest is over, and the St. Cloud convention has placed in nomination Hon. S. G. Comstock of Moorhead. Although the contest was a long and warm one, the best of feeling prevailed throughout, and the republican party goes into the campaign with none of that bitterness which so often is the outgrowth of such a struggle.

Mr. Comstock's record will bear the closest scrutiny. In many positions of trust, which he has held since coming to Minnesota in 1871, he has won the respect of his constituents and colleagues. He is a lawyer of extensive practice, is a gentleman of broad intelligence, and possesses an experience in legislative work and parliamentary practice, which fits him in an unusual degree for the position he is to fill. On the tariff question he is known to be in full accord with the prevailing sentiment of the people of Minnesota, which has found its best expression in the speeches of his distinguished predecessor, Hon. Knute Nelson, on the floor of Congress. There is no question that this was a powerful factor in securing his nomination. With Mr. Comstock its standard bearer, the republican party of the Fifth district has nothing to fear and everything to hope for.

It would be affectation to pretend that Duluth is not disappointed in failure to secure the nomination for Judge Stearns. The third largest city in the state, the only port of entry, not only for the state, but of the great northwest, the greatest primary wheat market in the world, with commercial and manufacturing intetests increasing in greater ratio than any city on this continent—with all these vast and growing interests so largely dependent upon intelligent congressional action, Duluth has claims to recognition such as are possessed by no other city or section of the district. It is a disappointment that a Duluth man was not chosen, but this will not affect in the slightest degree, the interest and earnestness of the republicans of this city in the campaign. Without a question Mr. Comstock is the choice of Duluth, next to one of our own citizens. That he will work earnestly and intelligently for Duluth's interests no one for a moment doubts.

Mr. Comstock will receive the solid republican vote of St. Louis County.

Princeton Union: S. G. Comstock is one of the very best men in the big Fifth congressional district, and he will be elected by at least 10,000 majority.

Brainerd Daily News: Senator Comstock is an honest man of good ability, and of noble qualities of heart and he will have the loyal support of the party in this city and county.

Candidate Comstock.

Little Falls Transcript.

Hon. S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, the republican nominee for congres in this district, is a man whom the republicans can and will heartily support. He is one of the leading men of the district, and has no superior in Northern Minnesota as a statesman. He has been prominent in the state legislature for several years, and his work there has been such as to commend him heartily to the people of the whole district. He has shown unusual ability in devising legislation for the good of the people, and has at all times stood firmly by the interests of the public. He has always been a staunch republican, and influential in party councils. His nomination will give more satisfaction throughout the district, than that of any other man, and his election is certain by an old time majority.

Mr. Comstock has always been a favorite with the republicans of this locality, and it will be remembered that they stood by him faithfully in his candidacy against C. A. Gilman for the nomination for lieutenant governor in 1883. The desire for Mr. Buckman's nomination in this part of the district had not lessened the esteem in which Mr. Comstock was held, and there was never any doubt the Moorhead senator would receive aid from here if the Sauk Rapids senator could not gain the nomination. On the final ballot Comstock received every vote the Buckman forces could muster. And a few stray ones from Barto decided the result by a bare majority.

Comstock Wins.

Fargo Republican.

As we go to press we have the gratifying news that the republican congressional convention in the Fifth Minnesota district which assembled at St. Cloud yesterday, brought its labors to a close this afternoon by the nomination of Hon. S. C. Comstock, of Moorhead, as the candidate for congress. We need not say that it is very pleasant intelligence for this side of the Red. Mr. Comstock was one of the pioneers of this valley, and though identified with rival local interests, and with another commonwealth, he has always been recognized as a leading, broad-minded, substantial and public-spirited citizen. He has been successful in business; has been honored by his locality and party—notably in representing our sister city and county and his senatorial district in the legislature of Minnesota, where he made a record of which he and his friends have a right to be proud. As his nomination means that he will be elected, the western portion of the big Minnesota Fifth will now stand a chance to get its share of congressional favors. We congratulate Mr. Comstock and Moorhead on this fortunate issue of the nominating contest.

Improved Live Stock.

The Difference Between Scrubs and Pure Bloods for the General Farmer.

Reference has repeatedly been made to the importance of the improvement of stock by the infusion of pure blood. A writer in the Farmers' Advocate has these excellent suggestions on the subject:

"I do not wish to be understood that the general farmer must be a breeder of thoroughbred stock, but in my opinion he must improve the stock he already has, for it is an undisputed fact that the scrub will always bring its breeder and feeder out in debt. With our low prices of produce, we must make the land produce all that is possible, and so dispose of the produce that it will bring the most money, and I know of no better way to accomplish this than to combine the raising of improved stock with our farming. As proof of this, let us look back to our mother country, old England, with her high rents and taxes, and we find that they were obliged to improve their stock, and with this, they have brought their soil up to the highest state of cultivation. In Holland, too, we find them improving their stock in certain lines for untold years. We are told that the people of Holland are slow to adopt new methods, but yet we find them with improved stock as a necessity to profitable agriculture. On the little island of Jersey, with her immense population and small area of land from which to draw her support, they were obliged to improve their stock so that it should subsist on the least possible food, and yet produce a large amount of butter; hence we have the little Jersey, an animal of very small stature, but yet a great butter producer. Our best farmers find it profitable to procure a full complement of the latest improved implements and to invest in suitable buildings to shelter them when not in use, and why will it not pay to apply the same rule to our stock. If a scrub cow that will make six pounds of butter per week week, pays for her keep, and, by the use of a thoroughbred sire from some of the dairy breeds, her offspring can be made to produce eight or ten pounds per week, the cross has given us a large margin of profit where before we had no profit. The keeper of a dairy herd should thoroughly and know whether they are paying him or not, and immediately beef the unprofitable ones. Jan. 31 good mixed butchers' stock, fat cows, heifers and light steers were quoted at $3.40 @ $3.75 per cwt., that being the best class marketed from the common stock of our country, and on the same day we found extra good steers, weighing 1,300 to 1,450 pounds quoted at $4.50 @ $5 per cwt. Here we have a difference of about $1 per hundred in favor of the improved stock, and this is not half the story, for the general average weight of the first class is only 800 or 900 pounds. At the heaviest weight and best price they would bring $33,75 apiece, while the grade, at 1,800 and $5 per hundred, would bring $65, or almost double the price of the scrub—a good return for the use of a thoroughbred sire. While the price of cattle per pound may and will fluctuate, yet the difference per pound between good and poor cattle will remain unchanged; the same may be said of all other kinds of stock. Generous feeding and care will be found very advantageous in dealing with all animals. I find it much more profitable to keep only as much stock as can be kept and cared for well, having this motto always in view, 'An honest profit for all food consumed.' To accomplish this, only finely bred males should be used. The breeds of stock kept should be those most suitable for the locality and the purpose required. These are considerations which have not received the attention they deserve from our farmers."

Duluth Evening Journal: Comstock was the second choice of almost everybody in Duluth. That is to say a Duluth man was our first choice, and Stearns, Graves or Hartley would have been satisfactory, but the nomination of a Duluth man proving impossible, Comstock was preferable to any other. Barto would have given satisfaction to many but Comstock is far more satisfactory to the people generally.

The government of the United States has in its possession one of the most interesting and complete collections of naval arms and accoutrements in existence. The collection is one of the features of the Navy Yard at Washington, where it forms a department known as the Naval Museum. Under the act of congress authorizing such loans the secretary of Navy has consented to allow the museum to be removed to the Minneapolis Exposition, there to remain from August 22d to September 29th, under the care of experienced members from the department. The large number of ancient cannon, repeating guns, pistols, swords, cutlasses and personal relics of our great naval commanders make an exceedingly interesting collection. In addition to these the museum contains all the modern repeating cannon and machine guns, the inventions of Hotchkiss, Gatling, Maxim, etc., which are the latest achievements in the line of destructive weapons. The loaning of this display is a high compliment to the show at Minneapolis, as it has never been permitted to go outside of its own building at the Navy Yard, before.

Duluth Evening Journal: The Fifth District has set a good example to the balance of the state by placing in nomination a man that would do credit to any district in any state in the union. As St. Louis County's representation in the next convention depends upon our vote for Comstock, it stands us in hand to do our duty, which will be done in good shape.

Go From Home to Learn the News.

The Toledo Blade gives the following, doubtless intended as a news item: "Representative Knute Nelson, of the Fifth Minnesota District, has been defeated for nomination in the Republican convention. He leans too much to free trade for his constituency." On the contrary, Mr. Blade, he is in full accord with his constituency upon the tariff question and this is not a "free trade district" either. We wonder how such a level headed paper as the Blade generally is, can make such a misrepresentation of the facts in this case when it should know that Mr. Nelson positively refused to accept another term. The fact is that Mr. Nelsen could have been nominated by acclamation had he allowed his name to be presented to the convention and he has but to accept to be elected to the United States Senate, or he could be governor if he would consent. The Blade is entirely at fault when it sets the great State of Minnesota down in the high-tariff column. Minnesota demands a just and reasonable revision of the tariff laws in the interests of the farmer and laboring man.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

'Round Home.

Quite a heavy rain on Saturday morning.

Knute Opheim came up from Fertile on Saturday.

"The day we celebrate" was duly observed in the city.

Geo. J. McManus took a trip to the Thirteen Towns last week.

John Alderman has rented his hotel on Robert Street and is now figuring on another business.

The sale of horses at the stock yards on Thursday was fairly well attended and a few sales made.

Al. McManus returned from Ann Arbor last week. He will spend his vacation in Polk County.

Capt. H. W. Donaldson was down from Kittson Co., on Thursday. Says they have had plenty of rain there recently.

Notice Fontaine & Anglim's windows, then step in and behold the interior—all worthy of a metropolitan establishment.

S. Skjolhoug was in from Fosston last week renewing acquaintances. He reports everything in a flourishing condition in the Thirteen.

Iver M. Johnson from the west side dropped in to report progress, on Friday. He is one of the assessors whose work is always found correct.

Sheriff Paulsrud returned from a visit to Wisconsin Saturday. Says the wheat in the Red River Valley beats any that he saw on his travels.

Mr. A. Sture returned on Thursday from a long visit to friends in the southern part of the State. He has been away ever since the convention.

Joseph Wedmann, foreman of Nelson's marble works left on Saturday evening for a week's visit at St. Paul. Mr. W. is one of the best artists in his line.

Thos. Ulven, an enterprising insurance agent from the Thirteen Towns, was in the city on Friday evening. Says the roads between this city and Fisher sadly need attention.

The manager of the Patee company paid a deserved compliment to manager Mathews for the pains that gentleman is taking to make everything pleasant and agreeable. Mr. Mathews has booked some excellent companies for the coming season.

Arne Higdem was over from the west side last week. Says there is as much whiskey sold in Grand Forks under the prohibition rule as before, if indeed there is not more. And yet Arne will stick to the prohibition party even with such brilliant evidences of their work before him.

Wm. Kistenmacher was surprised last week by a visit from his nephew, Hans Hotoph, of Marden, Manitoba, who came down to see how Americans live. Hans thinks he has no where in his travels struck a livlier city than Crookston and is very favorably impressed with the style of his American cousins.

Tollef J. Farden was down from Tilden on Monday. Reports crops looking excellent up that way. He informs the JOURNAL that Mr. Coleman Godfrey, one of the oldest settlers of that town, died on June June 28 of heart disease. Mr. G. was well and favorably known and his death is deeply mourned by hosts of friends.

Fontaine & Anglim's order book and delivery rig are in competent hands. If you don't know it, try them and be convinced.

Clark Van Housen started for his Elgin home on Sunday evening. He told our reporter that a letter from home informed him that people were wearing their overcoats owing to an extremly cold wave prevailing. They should migrate to this country where they are sure of summer weather in summer time.

The railroad and warehouse commissioners have called a meeting at their office in St. Paul on Wednesday, July 11th to consider the matter of making a uniform distance tariff, so far said tariff apply to grain, coal, lumber, live stock and dressed meats wholly within the state. Upon said consideration, all persons and parties will have an opportunity to be heard.

The Republicans of Polk County will hold a grand ratification meeting on the evening of Monday, June 16th, at the opera house in this city. Able speakers from abroad will be present, supplemented freely and ably by home talent. Hon. S. G. Comstock has been invited and is expected to be present. A grand time will be had and all who favor an honest government are cordially invited to attend.

The Times dignifies our bonfires in honor of the nomination into a full blown ratification meeting. As small as it was, it was thousands in comparison to the one held when the news arrived that the program of the boss, Grover, had been carried out by the nomination of Cleveland and the red bannana. Where was YOUR bonfire and YOUR speakers even? As small as that little impromtu affair was it dwarfed your own attempt so far that you should be ashamed to mention it.

Young America celebrated to its hearts content.

"Too much rain" is the expression we hear oftenest nowadays.

The Salmagundi Club will meet tomorrow evening, with Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler.

Fontaine & Anglim the old reliable dealers are on deck to supply your every want. Try 'em.

The Hon. S. G. Comstock has accepted the invitation to be with us on Monday evening, July 16th.

Miss Margaretta Christianson arrived last week to spend the summer with her sister, Mrs. Casper Sands.

A young man, working in the saw mill, had the misfortune, on Thursday last, to have his upper lip split by a shim from the gang.

Lancaster & Skinner have sold their livery business to Ed. Schraeder who will conduct the business at the old stand in the future.

At the last shoot, Barber and Morrisey tied on scores—18 out of 20—and Morrisey took the badge by getting the best of the shoot off.

If you are in need of wire for fencing call and see the samples of Larm wire that G. M. Barber is agent for. It is the boss fencing for colt pastures.

Engineer Fred Chapin was in from Great Falls last week. Fred thinks that country has a great future, but at present the route thereto is a desolate one. It will require some time to develope.

L. O'Brien intends to start to-day or to-morrow for the Promised Land—Tacoma. Says he has a job engaged and expects to rake in all the spare shekels they have out there and return to his first love—Crookston, to invest it.

M. Andersen was up from the west side last week on business connected with the assessment. Says grain is looking nicely and prospects good for better than an average crop. Farmers are all looking foward to a prosperous fal l with good prices..

The good people whose blood froze in their veins one hot evening last week, when certain strange (?) sounds floated suddenly out on the mosquito-laden air, again resorted to cooling fan breezes and iced drinks when informed that aforesaid sounds proceeded from Lieck's guitar and our Devil's flute. The boys say they "were just playing," and we guess they were.

Mine host Fortier informs our reporter that Mr. Jerome intends to build an addition to Hotel St. Louis 45 ft. on Ash same height. This will double the number of rooms and add to the office and dining room which will make that hotel equal to any in the city. It begins to look as though the long felt want in the hotel line was to be abundantly satisfied.

J. N. Bailey left on Tuesday's train for Thief River, on the banks of which he intended to hoist the stars and stripes and make that celebrated flintlock of his, do service as a cannon, and few forty-pounders do more effective execution—backwards, while he and his neighbor, Lo, gave vent to the patriotism that had been pent up in their loyal breasts since the last national anniversary.

Notice the new ad. of G. M. Barber in another column. Farmers who have had stock cut to pieces on the cruel barbs of the wire now in use will hail this new invention with delight as it provides a fence as cheap as the old wire and as safe as a board fence. From the peculiar construction of the barbs it is impossible for animals to tear themselves to pieces, at the same time they are taught a healthy respect for the fence. Go and examine this wire before you buy.

Up to the hour of going to press the man Maxwell has not been arrested. It was rumored that he had been seen about the streets in the fifth ward since but if this be so he has managed to keep out of the sight of the police. The woman was taken before His Honor, Judge Spendley on Friday, and, in default of bail committed to jail at Fergus Falls. It is quite evident that Maxwell does not intend to resume business here, having apparently made an assignment as it were.

Mrs. Van Cleve, of Minneapolis, gave an interesting and practical talk to a number of gentlemen assembled in the M. E. church last Sunday afternoon, having for a subject: Social Purity. She spoke on the same subject, to a large congregation of both sexes, in the Baptist church, Sunday evening. She is engaged in a noble work, and enlisted much sympathy as she told in her gentle way, of the different phases of the work. Owing to her presence, the children's concert was postponed until next Sunday evening.

At the shooting gallery, on Main St., Monday evening, a young man gave an exhibition of markmanship and cheek rarely equalled, He was just going to ring that bell, when an active representative of the canine tribe stopped near the target and stood, apparently, in deep meditation. A bystander, intent on mischief, said: "I'll give you a nickel to hit the dog." Leveling the piece, the young Nimrod blazed away, while the dog, whose meditations seemed suddenly to partake of a painful nature, gave a howl that expressed volumes, and sought a more secluded spot. The cheeky one thereupon turned on the instigator of the foul deed with: "Give me that nickel!" What wont a man do for money?

W. J. Nickle, of Edna, anticipated the happy event a little by coming up on the 3rd. He celebrated the ever glorious by riding a pony out to his old district near St. Hilaire.

The first boat of a line of six to be built for the Manitoba Co., arrived in Duluth recently and another is to be ready early in August. When this line is ready for operation it will mean more to this country than appears at first glance. It means that the Manitoba company will be in position to land our wheat in Buffalo as cheaply, or cheaper than it is now taken to Minneapolis and to bring all incoming freight at proportionate rates. This in itself considered is no small item as events will prove. Whether the new rates will be adopted this fall we cannot as yet say but we are of the opinion that there will be a large reduction before the present crop is ready for the market. We predict a rate to Buffalo not exceeding 19 cents per 100 in the near future. Mark the prediction.

The Creamery.

Mr. E. M. Walsh informs THE JOURNAL that they are now making on an average of 100 pounds of butter per day at the new creamery. They have in the neighborhood of 200 cows and more being added daily. As yet they have none from points north and south on the railroad, but are ready to arrange with parties who desire to ship cream. The present capacity of the creamery is 500 lbs. per day. Mr. Walsh hopes to be able to run to the full capacity before the end of the season. It costs but a trifle more to make 500 pounds per day than to make 100, and the institution would be able to pay more for cream if it was running at its fullest capacity. Mr. Walsh intends to pay the highest price possible for cream and desires the support of every intelligent, enterprising farmer in this vicinity. Every farmer should give the creamery a fair trial for if it can be made a success it will be of great benefit to this section.

We have only one note and mortgage we make a loan the day applied for, charge no bonus, and make interest payable at our office in Crookston.

Geo. A. Putnam, who last week bought out the old grocery establishment of Hartshorn & Hurlbut, sold to Barnes & Slocum, two young and experienced grocerymen who took possession on Saturday noon. Mr. O. J. Barnes is a nephew of the noted elevator man, G. S. Barnes, of Fargo and has been for some time connected with his uncle's establishment there. Mr. W. E. Slocum is from Charles City, Iowa. Both are enterprising young men are able to and will handle a big line of groceries. They have rented the room in the McKinnon block recently occupied by Haskett & Co., and expect to take possession early next week. They invite JOURNAL readers to call in and see them at the new stand.

Duluth Evening Herald. If a Duluth man could not have been chosen for congress there is every reason why Duluth should be satisfied with Comstock. He is an able and an honorable man, and the country from which he comes is directly interested in every improvement at Duluth that in any way affects our harbor or contributes in any way to our prosperity. Comstock's long service as a public man, and his wide experience as a lawyer tends to fit him for the work he will have to do. There was no question as to the fitness or integrity of Judge Stearns; there was no lack of popularity on his part, but there was a persistent determination to secure the representative from the western part of the district. Besides there were a few in the convention who failed to appreciate some of the unkind things said of Mr. Nelson by the Duluth papers last fall and winter. No man could have been more faithful to Duluth's interests than Nelson has been; no man could have been more heartily abused.

A Big Elevator Scheme.

Pioneer Press.

O. E Wolcott, secretary and principal owner of the Scandinavian Elevator company, has been in England for several weeks and has succeeded in furthering the scheme for a line of elevators in Minnesota and Dakota which shall ship wheat direct to English millers. Interested with Mr. Wolcott in this scheme is Gantri's Ste, Croix of England, who made a trip to the Northwest about three months ago on behalf of the English millers, and whose report of the situation has been made. In the London Millers' Gazette and Corn Trade Journal of June 11, an extended account is given of the scheme, which is to purchase the wheat of the Northwest farmers and ship it through their own elevators at Duluth and Buffalo direct to Liverpool and sell to the millers. Upon the report of Mr. Ste. Croix a number of the millers issued a circular letter endorsing the scheme and preferring support of the enterprise. These millers will become stockholders in the company and carry on the business on that side of the water. It is claimed that the shipment of wheat thus direct will make better prices for the hard wheat of Minnesota and Dakota.

The Anti-Saloon Plank.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

We heartily advocated, before the Republican platform was adopted, a rigorous anti-saloon plank. We did not expect it to indorse prohibition or high license or any other specific measure. What we said was this:

"As to specific methods, they may safely be left to be dealt with as the varying circumstances of different States may require. We do not expect to satisfy the demands of perfervid prohibition impracticables. But we do expect by a judicious anti-saloon declaration to meet the views of rational temperance men, and to further the cause of practical temperance reform."

On the last evening of the convention, an agreement was reached on a declaration of just the kind we advocated, and it was adopted and added to the platform by a practically unanimous vote. It was this:

The first concern of all good governments is the virtue and sobriety of the people and the purity of their homes. The Republican party cordially sympathizes with all wise and well-directed efforts for the promotion of temperance and morality.

This merely recognizes the fact that the Republican party is on the side of the home as against the saloon. It leaves to the States to adopt such measures, at such time and in such order, as local circumstances may warrant.

The Republican party of the nation is in line with the advanced and rational sentiment of the day on this pressing subject of social reform.

The Duluth Evening Journal says: "Hartley know what he was talking about because, had Depew been nominated, James G. Blaine would have stumped the State and the Fifth District would have given him 10,000 to 15,000 majority, &c." Does the Journal take us for a lot of babies who do not know their own minds to make such an assertion? Mr. Blaine is a great man it is true, but even his persuasive eloquence would not have saved the State. You see, Mr. Journal, men are doing a heap of good healthy thinking for themselves now-a-days; they come pretty near knowing for themselves what they want and what they don't want, and while they have a great espect for Mr. Blaine they do not need him or any other man to tell them whom they want or whom they must not vote for. According to the Evening Journal our Minnesota people don't know how to vote until some great man tells them what to do.

Duluth Evening Herald: The votes in the convention were transferred from Judge Stearns to Col. Graves at the request of the former, but the change was too late. The combination was made against Duluth's candidate. On the 45th ballot Comstock had 50, Barto 19, Corliss 15, Graves 15, from which it appears the Duluth men stood by their guns until the last, and went down with their flag flying. The contest was a good natured one throughout.

San Francisco Chronicle: Gen. Harrison has been selected as the Republican candidate, not by the State of California, but by the great Republican party in convention assembled. He now stands as the chosen representative of the principles of Republicanism and notably of that grand principle, protection. It is the duty and doubtless will be the pleasure of every genuine Republican to give him a cheerful, earnest and hearty support.

Verndale Journal: Forty ballots were cast at the congressional convention at St. Cloud, without any very material change, but from that time forward Comstock gained until the forty-fifth ballot when he received fifty votes and his nomination was assured. As soon as the result was announced, Hon. J. C. Flynn, of Little Falls, on the part of Senator Buckman, moved to make Comstock's nomination unanimous, which was acceded to by acclamation. The convention was the most peaceful and good natured one we ever saw, considering the length of the struggle for mastery, and closed without bitterness or cause for revenge.

Duluth Evening Herald: Comstock is supposed to have had the sympathy and good will of Hon. Knute Nelson, and that this contributed somewhat to his success.

THE LITTLE KERCHIEF.

Cassell's Magazine.

It was only a wee, worn kerchief that lay in my trembling hands.
As I sat by the window, dreaming, and looked on the moon-lit hands;
It was only a wee, worn kerchief, but it filled my heart with tears,
For it spoke of my beloved and the unforgotten years.

I thought of the old, old garden, where many a happy night
She stood in the Summer-moonlight and waved that kerchief white,
As she watched in fond confiding, for she knew that it would be
A beacon of light to guide me, a signal of love to me.

But the moon rose over the meadows; the night grew hushed and still;
And methought that my beloved came down from the old, sweet hill;
Once more her hand was waving, once more that kerchief white
Flashed like the wing of an angel out of the silent night.

So I kept the little kerchief with a trust that ne'er grows cold,
For I know that my love is waiting, as once in the days of old.
And out of the bright blue heaven there will come, in the years to be,
Her message of old to call me, her signal of love to me.

MARQUISE AND HEADSMAN.

A Dinner for two, Where the Last Course Came Beneath the Guillotine.

Ella W. Peattie in the American Magazine.

The year was 1779; the month was August; the hour the meridian. Madame la Marquise de Lamerliere was returning to Paris from her country seat. She was oppressed with hunger, with sleeplessness and with heat. Her maid yawned and yawned, and there certainly is nothing more contagious. The roads were poor, the horses lame with travel, and the coach was cumbersome owing to its elegance.

The sight of an inn, with its clean-swept stable-yard, its wide porch and expansive landlord, was therefore most welcome.

Madame replaced her hat and felt her puffs, the lackeys flicked the dust from their shoulders, the maid surreptitiously interviewed the rouge box; the inn was in a great flurry, there was a scare among the fowls and madame la Marquise was assisted to alight.

The innkeeper bowed to the ground. If madame had only been an hour earlier! There was a beautiful room which should have been placed at the disposal of Madame, but—so miserably unfortunate was he—it was taken.

Madame sank into a chair and rolled by a pair of limpid eyes, the innkeeper offered to kill himself; the maid found Madame's vinaigrette.

Just then a gentleman entered. He was handsome, and in his prime—facts which madame was not too fatigued to gather. His costume was of green cloth, his three-cornered hat of the same color; his short sword had a hilt of chased gold. The Marquise rose and returned his salutation.

"I have had the honor, madame," said the young man, with some embarrassment, "to hear your remarks. I leave immediately after dinner. I have already refreshed myself with a bath. Permit me to resign my room to you."

Madame courtesied lower than before. "You have my thanks, monsieur. Permit me to inquire whom I thank."

"An officer of Parliament, madame."

"We will dine together, if you please monsieur. A solitary meal is apt to be an indigestible one. I am the Marquise de Lamerliere."

The young man bowed again.

The Marquise withdrew with ceremony. It was an hour before she reappeared. When she did it was clear from the savor in the room that the fowls had not been scared for nothing. The red-tiled floor had been freshly swept, the fire-place filled with green branches, the casements thrown open, allowing the honeysuckle to peep through. The table was laid with massive silver and some unmatched pieces of china. The gentleman in green escorted madame to her seat—a leathern chair—over which the innkeeper's wife, careful of madame's embroideries, had thrown an ancient shawl of silk, much beflowered.

"Madame," said the gentleman, "I have taken the liberty of overseeing the dinner myself. I trust you will be kind enough to bear in mind, if anything about it displeases you, that it is my first experience of the sort."

Madame blushed and smiled.

"I have seen enough already, monsieur, to prove to me that you have an aptitude for the art of ordering dinner. But victuals are the least part of a meal, I assure you."

"Say you so, madame?" cried the young man. "Then I can only hope that the superior, unknown quality, whatever it may be will not be lacking in the present repast."

The Marquise allowed those limpid eyes to droop.

"I cannot imagine, said she, that there will be a lack of any sort."

The gentleman in green decided that the Marquise must be under twenty-five. Had she been older her face could not have been so absolutely joyous. When the unctuous landlord had puffed out of the room for a moment, the gentleman ventured the remark:

"Your husband has already preceded you to Paris, Marquise?"

"My husband, monsieur, has preceded me yet farther. He is in Paradise."

"I beg a million pardons! I have been stupid, Marquise. How can you overlook it?"

The face of the Marquise lit up suddenly with a most mischievous smile.

"You have not been stupid, said she, with three dimples in full play. "You have been curious."

"I am guilty," cried he filling her glass again with amber liquid, "but anyone would say there were extenuating circumstances."

"Ah, monsieur, doubtless you have discovered that there are crimes of which one can be guilty without being a culprit?" The remark came to a sudden close, for the heavy oak door swung open and the host entered with a lordly dish draped with a napkin.

"Great heavens!" cried madame when she saw it. "Is the headsman here? Does he think I am Herodias! Is he serving me the head of John the Baptist on a charger?"

The young man sprung to his feet.

"What is it?" cried madame.

"I wish to make room for the dish, Marquise. I should be filled with remorse if I jogged the elbow of our host. Permit me." He lifted the napkin. It was the head of a young pig wreathed with parsley.

"I was right, monsieur, it has been a case of the headsman."

"I trust you perceive, Madame la Marquise, that a headsman is a valuable member of society."

Madame put her jewelled fingers over her eyes and gave a shrug to her shoulder.

"I had the misfortune once, monsieur, to behold the executioner—Monsieur de Paris. Fortunately I saw him only from a distance. He was hideous!"

"Is it possible, madame? I have always supposed that he was rather a handsome fellow. He has certainly set the fashion for us. He wore blue, to the disgust of the nobles; and he wore it, I have heard, with some grace."

"Bah!" ejaculated madame.

"So indeed they say, madame. Indeed, they go even so far as to say that some of the nobles who were insignificant in stature grew envious of him; and it is certainly true that Parliament prohibited him from wearing the color of the court. Allow me to give you some of this jelly. Shall I give you leaner meat? But the executioner took a revenge which was worthy of a Frenchman."

"Monsieur, you should not call an executioner a Frenchman!"

"Madame, wait till you hear the revenge. Since Sanson—his name is Sanson, you know—could not wear blue, he took to green. The Court objected to his wearing velvet; he therefore wore cloth. As the consequence is, Marquise—forgive me, your glass is empty—the consequence is, that all the beaux of the court, with the brilliant Marquise de Letorieres at their head, adopted the cut and color of his garment and wear their coats a la Sanson—as I do, Marquise."

"There is no denying that your costume is an elegant one, monsieur, and yet I think I shall hereafter look with apprehension on others of its kind, lest I encounter him who makes a living out of murder. I hear he has a garden of the finest roses in France, and he sprinkles them with blood to give them the deep crimson which makes them so famous."

"I have no doubt, madame," said her companion, gravely, "that he dines on maidens' hearts."

Madame looked up. It was evident from his tone that he was bored. The Marquise rallied immediately. She broke out into a laugh as musical as the song of the bird.

"It is very certain," said she, shaking one finger at him, "that you think me childish because I chatter so. But you are mistaken, I am quite learned. I read Voltaire, if you please. I am interested in journalism. I can criticise the drama, and I know the history of France by heart."

"I shall be afraid to speak before you," protested the gentleman, rather flattered by her coquetry.

"Never fear," said madame, with a magnanimous air. "I will overlook your deficiencies. I will overlook everything if you will confess that you adore the theatre."

"Marquise, no one is present oftener than I."

"Then we shall meet there. I am hastening home now to see Mlle. Clarion. I never miss a chance. For one thing I am watching to see if she will ever grow old."

The landlord came in with the dessert. The young man no longer felt any embarrassment. It was evident that the wine was of good quality.

There was a stir in the yard.

"Another arrival," murmured madame, with some vexation.

"I shall hasten my departure," said the young man. "Let me make apologies for its abruptness. I am very grateful to you, Marquise," he continued in a low voice, raising her soft hands to his lips, "for the pleasure you have conferred upon me. It will be a treasured memory with me. In the many dark days which are before me I shall cherish this bright hour—" The Marquise arose and lifted a scarlet face.

"Really," she said gently, "I see no need for this tone of pathos," and she ventured to smile saucily. "You are doubtless acquainted with many of my friends. They will present you."

The officer bowed over her hand again and hurried from the room just as a new-comer entered it.

"Tontel," cried the Marquise "it is you?" It was hard to get her face back to its usual expression, and she put up her painted fan to hide it. The new comer looked first at the Marquise and then after the departing officer. He gasped and blushed and stared again.

"Mon Dieu," cried the Marquise impatiently, "what ails you?"

A post-chaise rattled into the yard. The handsome officer took his seat, he doffed his green hat to madame with melancholy stateliness and was driven away.

"Speak, Tontel!" said the Marquise, stamping her pointed shoes.

"May I ask you, Marquise, if you knew the occupation of the man who has just left you?"

"He said he was an officer of parliament," said the lady clasping her heart with apprehension.

The gentleman burst into a loud laugh.

"Well, so he is," said he. "He is Sanson, the executioner of Paris. He has just been down in the country to help three good fellows to a night's lodgin."

"You mean—" screamed the lady, holding up her hands as if blood were dripping off her fingers.

"I mean that yesterday was a busy day with him."

"For the love of heaven bring me water! A basin of water, Nicole! Quick. Mon Dieu! Mon dieu!"

The maid rushed in breathlessly and madame as she bathed and rebathed her dimpled hands and sobbed:

"I'll have him hanged!"

SECOND COURSE.

Mme la Marquise Lamerliere sat in Parliament. She had petitioned that one Charles Henri Sanson, commonly known as Monsieur de Paris, executioner of Paris, be sentenced to beg her pardon with a rope around his neck for the insult he had been guilty of in dining with her and meeting her on terms of equality, and that for the safety of the public the executioner should thenceforth wear a distinctive sign so that all would know him.

About the Marquise sat a symapathizing company of friends from the court, among them Colonel Tontel, who had encountered her at the inn.

Charles Henri Sanson had not been able to procure an advocate. No barrister cared to appear as counsel of the executioner.

The advocate of the plaintiff forgot nothing. He laid stress on the flagrant insult Madame la Marquise complained of. We described with much eloquence the sad situation of the poor lady after she had been informed of the profession of the man with whom she had dined.

Charles Henri Sanson appeared wrapped in thought. When he lifted his eyes it was to fix them on the face of Madame la Marquise—a face which was paler than when he had seen it first. When the time came for his defence he arose with a severe air and addressed the Court with much hauteur.

"It is fortunate for me, gentlemen," said he "that, being charged before you as a criminal, nothing is alleged against my honesty. Why, then, am I a culprit? Because I have performed functions which are said to be infamous. I ask you, gentleman, if there are infamous functions in the State?

"Infamy is the appanage of crime, and where there is no crime there can be no infamy. The discharge of my functions is not criminal, sirs; it is an act of justice, and the same principle of equity which leads you to pass a sentence actuates me when I inflict the penalty upon the culprit. The fact is that our functions are associated to such a degree that mine cannot be stigmatized without moral imputation on yours

"I am aware that all public offices are not equally honorable; they are creditable in proportion to their usefulness to society. According to this principle, sirs, mine stands first. What would the State do if my office were suppressed for a single day?

"The kingdom would be given up to brigandage. Impunity would kill the laws; virtue would be despised; vice would prevail. There would be one law—that of the strongest. They would laugh at your sentences, gentlemen. It is in the shadow of my sword that innocence breathes freely, that the police are powerful and that public order prevails.

"My office is considered dishonorable because I slay men. Ask a soldier what his profession is; he will tell you that, like me, he is a slayer of men. Yet his company is never shunned and no one thinks he is disgraced by eating in his company. If there is any difference between us, surely it is in my favor. For whom does a soldier slay? Innocents, very honorable men, whose only crime is that they do their duty. I respect innocence. I kill only culprits. I purge society of the monsters who disturb its repose.

"Soldiers repress only external raids; they have to fight but rarely; lapses of twenty years have passed without the army being called into action. I preserve peace at home. I continually restrain the insolence of bad citizens, not a week passes in which I do not punish crime and avenge the wrongs of the injured.

"Then, too, each solitary soldier, each officer, contributes in but a small degree to the tranquility of the state; the glory of preserving public tranquility is divided among so many thousand men that each individual has only a small share of the privilege. On the other hand, in my profession, lies the advantage of alone ensuring public peace, and I can say without exaggeration that I alone in my vast department secure quiet more effectually on behalf of the State than a hundred thousand men can do.

"Do not believe, gentlemen, that in defending the unjustly attacked prerogatives of my office I claim any personal merit; I know that an office, however brilliant, is always distinct from the individual who holds it. As I lay no claim to the glory of my functions, it would be unjust to cast upon me the opprobrium which the thoughtless have seen fit to attach to them, and to call me infamous because it is alleged that my office deserves the epithet. Permit me to add that I have the honor to be the fourth of my family to whom the office of Public Executioner of Paris has descended from father to son, and if hereditary nobility were attached it, as it should be, I might stand on even ground with Madame la Marquise.

"You laugh, gentlemen, at the word 'hereditary.' I cannot find anything extraordiary or preposterous in it. Military offices, which, as I have observed, are inferior to it, enjoy the same advantages. Yours, gentlemen—allow me to say so—yours, which only contribute to the public weal in an indirect way, have the same privilege. Why is the concession denied to my office? None among you, gentlemen, can, individually, insure public hapiness effectually; none can pronounce a sentence except in conjunction with all the other members of the body. Thus you never act otherwise than as members, whereas I alone procure peace, and I act as chief.

"Now every chief is respectable, and to whatever category he may belong he should enjoy the privilege of nobility. The general prosecutor, who is the chief of his department, has it; so does the chief clerk of court. Why should I be deprived of it by an unrighteous exception.

"I will press no further the sovereign reasons suggested by the justice of my case; I merely point them out, as you may see. Men of my profession can think better than they can speak; can handle the sword better than make an address. I believe, nevertheless, that I have said enough to urge confidently that Madame la Marquise should be nonsuited. I therefore ask, not that the alleged infamy of my office be removed, for no infamy is attached to it, but that it be declared not only that I am a member of the sovereign court, but that I am the head of my department; that my office has particular resemblance to the profession of arms; that in consequence I have a right to the prerogative of gown and sword; and I further ask that in virtue of this twofold title nobility be conferred upon me as well as upon my posterity, and I am confident that you cannot but grant my request. I ask no favor, but I expect everything of your equity."

The court retired to confer, and decided that the case should be indefinitely postponed. When the Marquise de Lameliere left, she returned once to look at Charles Henri Sanson. He bowed low. Madame first cast on him a look of withering scorn, and then, oddly enough, she returned the salutation.

* * * * * * * * *

THIRD COURSE.

It was the reign of the guillotine—that fata and reliable instrument which Louis XVI. himself perfected. Poor Louis, who would have made an excellent locksmith! It was that delirious carnival of anarchy when all the passions went en masque; when tyranny wore the guise of humanity, and humanity arrayed, itself in terrorism; and conspiracy, partriotism, grief and laughter went arm in arm wearing the red cap of liberty. Death was made jocular. The very execrations of the mob were sinister witticisms.

"Hah," said Ducos, the youngest of the condemned Girondins, as he climbed the scaffold, "what a pity they did not decree the unity and indivisibility of our persons!"

So they laughed and died—for liberty! King and queen, peasant and beggar, Camille Desmoulins and Corday and Danton, the little mantuamaker, the old mender of roads, the much-tried baker! They died by the thousand.

"It seems," cried Charles Henri Sanson, "as if they had made a revolution only to give me work.

"They are disgracing the guillotine," complained his assistants with grotesque pride. There was a time when Citizen Fouquier-Tinville ordered that Sanson should have fourteen of these assistants.

At last the supremacy of the executioner was acknowledged. The cracked bell upon the panels of the carriage was the only coat-of-arms left in France.

But the vehicles on which the attention of Paris was centred were the carts rolled from the prison to the Place de la Revolution.

"Not many to-day," said a citoyenne, discontentedly, as these carts lumbered by her.

"No, said her companion; "Sanson wont earn his wages."

The crowd about the scaffold seemed to be interested, however. They were apparently anticipating some especially well seasoned dish in their diet of tragedy.

When the carts stopped the executioner assisted a lady to alight. It was the Marquise de Lamerliere.

"I will wait upon you first, Marquise," he said, uncovering his head.

"You are very kind, Monsieur l'executioner; but there is a poor youth here whom I would save from the unpleasant sight."

"It is against orders, madame."

"The revolution gives ladies the precedence, does it? Thank it, in my name. But, I am sure, you will not refuse the last request of a lady. Kindly execute this trembling youth first."

The executioner bowed. The lady returned it with as much grace as she had shown fourteen years before.

Then she turned to the youth by her: Courage! courage!" she whispered.

The youth flung his arms around her neck.

"What do I die for?" he sobbed.

The assistants took him away. They forced him down to the weigh plank.

The executioner approached the Marquise. She accepted his hand and ascended the steps of the scaffold with vivacity.

"You no longer wear green, I see, monsieur," said she, archly.

"Madame," said Sanson, "say you forgive me for what I am about to do."

"Monsieur," replied the lady, "you affronted me once. You are doing me a favor now. I shall join a brilliant company, for all who were worthy to live are now dead."

"Have you any request to make?"

"I have one—a foolish one. Be good enough to discharge your assistant for a moment. I should like to feel that I had been executed by a gentleman."

"It shall be as you say. Farewell!"

"Farewell, monsieur. By the way, how well that pig's head looked in the parsley!" She kept on laughing till she was bound.

"Say a prayer," whispered Sanson.

"I have prayed. I have no fear. It is the fashion to die now, Sanson, and I have always followed the fashion."

* * * * * * * *

"How many to-day?" queried the wife of Charles Henri Sanson that night.

"Only five," said he, the day has been quiet."

Abnormal Sleep.

Familiar as is normal sleep, no one can fully explain it. It is, nevertheless, a blessed fact. Though it seems to take one third from our life, it really prolongs it by the daily renewing of vigor.

Some of the abnormal forms of sleep exhibit strange phenomena. We need not dwell on sleep induced by opiates the lethargy of apoplexy, and, what is doubtless akin to it, the sleep of the drunkard, the coma of Bright's disease and diabetes, and the almost irresistible sleep caused by freezing cold.

The sleep of somnambulism is a very interesting form. The person will get up and go abroad in the darkness and into the most dangerous situations wholly without fear. The power of sight is often greatly exalted, and seems sometimes wholly independent of ordinary vision.

Another form is that of catalepsy. In this there is an entire loss of sensibility and ordinary consciousness. The limbs may be placed in any position, the most grotesque and uncomfortable, and they remain so, as if they were made of wax.

Still another form is that of hypnotism, or mesmerism, induced on susceptible subjects by skilled manipulators. The person becomes insensible to pain, and his will is entirely subject to that of the experimenter. The barest suggestion through any sense is sufficient to put the person under the dominance of the idea suggested.

Akin to artificial hypnotism is a morbid condition into which persons of a nervous organization sometimes fall. The celebrated "Solo Sleeper" would, for many years, fall asleep for a fortnight or more at a time, meanwhile exhibiting more or less of the peculiar characteristics of hypnotism. Many similar cases might be cited. For hardly a month passes when the newspapers do not tell the wonderful story of some "sleeping girl," who has been living unconscious for weeks; but some of the cases are not only interesting scientifically, but pathetic.

In 1745 the wife of an English colonel apparently died. The husband persistently refused to have her buried, and watched over her cold and motionless body for eight days. Suddenly, on the bells of a church ringing, she started up, saying, "It is the last prayer bell; it is time to go."

A lady patient was requesting to have a hot-water bottle put to her feet, saying, "I feel"—when she passed into a cataleptic state, and remained in it three hours. On opening her eyes, she ended her sentence,— "a great cold over my whole body.,'—Companion.

Gen. Grant's Way with the Pope.

The Italian papers are full of gossip about the king of Sweden's visit to Rome. His simplicity took all the courtiers by surprise. King Humbert put four state carriages at his disposal—King Oscar only used them once. His experience at the Vatican have been in a way unparalleled. He is the first crowned head whom Leo XIII, has received. Papal etiquette lays down that if a king on arriving at Rome does not visit the Vatican before the Quirinal, he will not be received by the holy father. The rule is relaxed in the case of Protestant's; but if the King of Sweden had come to the Vatican in one of King Humbert's state carriages, his reception might have been quite different. As it was it has furnished a new precedent, not so much for the reception by the pope as by his guest. The king of Sweden kissed the pontiff on both cheeks. Such a salute was quite irregular. Long usage had established the fashion of merely kissing the hand. In the case of Pio Nono it was broken by the ex-president of the United States. Gen. Grant merely shook hands with the pope, and said: "How do you do sir?"—Pall Mall Gazette.

A BACHELOR'S SECRET.

I keep one precious bit of gold,
Safe hidden like a miser;
And yet if found by robber bold,
He'd never steal my wealth untold,
And none would be the wiser.

Why do I hoard this bit of gold,
Ne'er giving it or lending?
My friend, the story's trite and old:
I loved—but words were weak and cold,
Let's hasten to the ending.

The bit I keep no one could miss
From all her wealth, her glory
Of golden hair—gold, and like this,
This curl I took, and left a kiss—
And now you know the story.

"Why prize it so?" I think may be Half way in scorn, you queried.
Ah, friend, a miser lovingly
Saves out one bit of gold—ah, me!
When all the rest is buried.

One bit he saves to touch and see,
As I this little token.
Sweetheart, 'tis all I have of thee—
This and a life long memory,
Of love that ne'er was spoken.

Through weary years my bit of gold
I've hoarded like a miser;
Friend, when my heart grows tired and cold,
This curl lay in my dying hold,
And none will be the wiser.

SCRATCHED OUT.

During the eariler years of the present century the Russian nobles ruled their households with a high hand. Accordingly, when the Dowager Countess Cheraski found that her only son, Ivan, a young man of about twenty years, was engaged to marry a beautiful serf on his estates, she forthwith banished him to France and ordered the girl to whom he was engaged to marry another serf immediately. As her commands had to be obeyed, poor Sophia Uschakoff, for that was the girl's name, went with her father, some six days after the counts departure, to the chapel where the marriage service was to be performed. There were present, beside her father and herself, Michael Tokhtamish (the bridegroom), his father, and the priest, an old man who was upward of seventy years of age. The service had scarcely commenced when the door of the little chapel opened, and Ivan Cheraski, the young count, entered with a revolver in his hand.

"You thought I was out of the country," he said; "but not so. I have been biding my time not far away from here. I knew all about the infamous attempt to marry my betrothed to this clown, and I have come to prevent it. Everything is ready—the priest, the alter, and the bride. So, my good father, you will please marry me to Sophia Uschakoff at once, or you and Michael Takhtamish shall die before five minutes are over."

I do not know what would have happened if the priest had refused to obey the count's order. As I have said, Russian nobles used to be, and very likely still are, rather high-handed, especially in dealing with their dependants. At all events, Ivan Cheraski was a nobleman armed with a revolver, Michael Tokhtamish was only a serf who might have been shot for the fun of the thing, while the priest was a very infirm old man, and bound, moreover, by his religion to discountenance bloodshed. So the serf stood aside, the nobleman took his place, the priest performed the service, and in a few minutes Ivan Cheraski and Sophia Uschakoff were man and wife. The service over, the company entered the vestry room, where the priest proceeded to enter the particulars relating to the marriage in the registry book.

Now I must pause here to inform the reader that in Russia it was the custom for the priest, and not the parties who were married, to sign the names of the bride and the bridegroom in the marriage register. Alexander Troubetskoi, the priest was placed, as the saying is, between two fires. If he had not obeyed the count's orders he would have been shot. On the other hand, if the countess dowager found out what he had done, something else as bad, or worse, would probably happen. To escape from the dilemma he entered in the register Michael Tokhtamish instead of Ivan Cheraski as the name of the bridegroom. The parties who were interested did not observe substitution. The register was restored to its place, and the Count and Countess Cheraski left secretly for Paris that evening.

For five years they lived very happily in France, and then the count died, leaving the countess a widow with two children. His mother had died about a year before, and Troubetskoi expired shortly after they left the village of Narovel, where the marriage took place. On the death of her husband the countess went to the province of Minsk in Russia to claim his estate on behalf of herself and his children. The claim was opposed by his family, who produced evidence of her marriage, not with Ivan Cheraski, but with Micheal Tokhtamish. There seemed, then, to be no use in resorting to legal proceedings, as the evidence of the witnesses to the marriage, who were all serfs, would be worthless against the evidence of the marriage register. Accordingly the countess, as she was de jure, if not de facto, returned to France. Partly by the sale of her jewelry, and partly owing to her husband having invested some money in their joint names in French 3 per cent rentes, she had a little more than £2,000, and with this capital she opened a sort of boarding house in Paris. Here she had been living for about two years when a young Englishman named Edwin Marston came to stop at her establishment for a few days. Up to the present I have not said anything about the character or appearance of the Countess Cheraski, because, so far, I have merely been reciting a number of facts which are necessary to enable the reader to understand the curious tale that we are approaching. That she was either pretty, or handsome, or beautiful, in some sense or other, the reader will probaby anticipate from the fact of the count having fallen in love with her. If I mention that she was tall, with dark hair and aquiline features, all who are interested in the matter can fill up the rest of her portrait to suit their own tastes. In character she must have been of a rather trustful disposition, as will, I think, appear from her conduct to Mr. Marston. He was senior by about two years, and had been practicing as a surgeon and physician for some time in a very poor district in the east end of London. When he first came to her house he did not intend to remain many days in Paris, but his stay was prolonged for one reason or another over a space of about three weeks, during which time he and the countess had contracted a very sincere friendship for each other. Finally, on the night before he left, she told him her history, and asked him if he could see any way in which she could establish the rights of herself and children.

"Not at present," said Mr. Marston, when he had listened attentively to her story; "but I shall think the matter over. One sometimes, after reflection, gets ideas that would never come from mere ratiocination, though it is ratiocination which afterward makes them practical—ideas that seem at first to have no bearing on the subject of thought, while in reality contain its full explanation. I am not very hopeful of being able to give you any advice that would be of use to you in this case; but I shall try, if possible, to think of something that may guide you."

The next day Mr. Marston left for London, having bade the countess a cordial farewell, and promised to write to her at once if any idea should occur to him with regard to the recovery of her title and estates.

More than a month passed away, during which she did not hear from him, and, consequently, was beginning do think that he had probably forgotten all about her, or he would have written, when one evening the servant came upstairs to say that Mr. Marston was in the parlor on the ground floor, and would like to see her.

"I have been thinking ever since I left you," he said, when they had greeted each other, "of the extraordinary history you told me. And I think now that I see my way to overcome your difficulties. But you will have to exercise great patience. It will take me probably a year, perhaps more, to carry out my plans. I shall have to go to Russia and live in the village of Narovel, and I shall want at least £400 at once, and probably another £400 in the course of about six months. In the meantime you must be content not to ask me any questions, and to remain in perfect ignorance of what I am doing. My word is the only guarantee you can have that I shall be honestly doing my best in your behalf."

"It is sufficient," said the countess. "You shall have the money. When can you start?"

"To-morrow," was the answer.

Accordingly, next day Mr. Marston started for Narovel, which is a village in the province of Minsk, in Western Russia. Here he took up his abode in the guise of a well-to-do Englishman, who wished to make himself acquainted with the language and institutions of the country, and who had no objection to spend his money freely. He was a good shot, was fond of riding and, apart altogether from the necessity of acting a part which was involved by the business he had on hand, he was a really jovial and pleasant companion. The consequence was that he soon became a favorite with everybody in the district. The men liked him because he was a capital sportsman and could take his bottle with the best of them; the women, because he was a good-looking foreigner, who was always giving them such compliments as circumstances permitted and who was very fond of children. Among others with whom he shortly became very intimately acquainted was the new priest, a young man named Nicholas Kohl. Kohl acted, as priests very often do in Russia, the part both of priest and physician to the district. And, since Marston was able to give him a great deal of valuable advice and assistance, they soon became fast friends.

One day, about five months after he came to Narovel, he went with Kohl into the vestry room of the chapel where the countess was married. He had been in this room frequently before, and knew exactly where the book in which her marriage was registered lay among some others in a sort of cupboard. Already he had, on the pretense of comparing the Russian system with the English, examined several registers of births, deaths and marriages, so that he was familiar with the forms, and on looking at a book of such registers could easily find any particular one that he might be in quest of. As yet, however, he had no opportunity of examining the book which contained the record of the marriage of the countess. Now what he had been scheming for during the past five months was to get this book secretly into his possession for about half an hour. Already he had found a number of plans for getting half an hour alone in the vestry room, but these he had discarded one by one as being unsuitable. At last, as often happens in such cases, an accident gave him the opportunity he sought. On the occasion in question they were going for a long walk, and had only gone into the vestry-room to leave a parcel which the priest had in his hand. Scarcely, however, had they entered the room when they were followed by a little girl who had seen them go into the chapel. She had been at the priest's house to look for him, as her mother, who was very ill, wished to see him a few minutes.

"I shall wait here for you," said Marston, speaking to Kohl in French, when he understood what the little girl's errand was. "I can read till you come back." There were some French and Latin books in the room.

"Very well," said Kohl, "it's only a few minutes' walk from here. I shall not be more than half an hour."

When the girl and priest had left the chapel, Marston took out of the cupboard the volume that contained the register of the countess' marriage, and turned over the pages till he came to the entry he was in search of. Yes, there, in black and white, was the record of the marriage of Sophia Uschakoff with Michael Tokhtamish. Mr. Marston looked at the register intently for a minute or two, during which time he turned rather pale. Then he got up and looked out of the vestry room to see that there was nobody in the chapel. Having satisfied himself that he was quite alone, he sat down again and examined the characters in which the name of Michael Tokhtamish was written with the greatest care for about a a minute. Finally, he took out of his pocket a penknife, a bottle of ink, and a pen which he carried about with him in anticipation of an opportunity like the present. With the penknife he carefully erased the name of Michael Tokhtamish. It took him about three minutes to do this, so anxious was he to do the work neatly, and not to leave a trace of the letters he was removing from the register. When he had succeeded to his liking he put the penknife in his pocket again, and having carefully examined the pen to see that the nib was in order to proceed to write over the erasure the name of——

Let me first ask if the reader has guessed whose name it was that Mr. Marston wrote over the name he had been at such pains to erase? Some people of whom I have asked the question have guessed that he wrote his own name. But why so? On a subsequent occasion he did write his own name in a marriage register after Sophia Cheraski had written hers. But on the present occasion he could not have gained anything by so doing. And the same objection will apply to his writing most other names over the erasure.

No. Having most carefully erased the name of Michael Tokhtamish, he proceeded with the very greatest care to write the name of Michael Tokhtamish as nearly as possible in the same place and characters that it stood before. when he had done this to his satisfaction, he let the ink dry, and then restored the book to its place. Kohl came back presently, and they went for their long walk.

About three weeks afterward Mr. Marston found that he had business which necessitated his leaving for England, and, very much to the regret of the inhabitants of Narovel, he departed. From Russia he went straight to Paris, where he called upon the Countess Cheraski, with whom he had held no communication whatever during the whole time he was visiting at Narovel.

"You have placed implicit confidence in me," he said, "and you will find that it has not been abused. I have told you before that you must not ask any questions; and I tell you so again. You must do exactly as I direct you without asking why. Commence proceedings at once for the restoration of your titles and estates. And mark me, when the register is produced, insist on having every word of your marriage most carefully examined. Do exactly as I tell you, and you will find that the result will be satisfactory. And now, good-by. I must get back to London to see if I cannot get my patients again."

The countess did as he told her to do. She commenced an action on behalf of herself and her children for the restoration of her title and estates. The register of her marriage was produced, but when it was found that the name of Michael Tokhtamish was written over an erasure. This destroyed the value of the register as evidence of a marriage between Sophia Uschakoff and Michael Tokhtamish. The natural presumption, in fact, the moral certainty, was that somebody else's name had been erased from the place where the name of Michael Tokhtamish had been written; and further that the somebody else was the man who married Sophia Uschakoff. Under these circumstances the evidence of Michael Tokhtamish himself and the two other witnesses who were present at the marriage, together with the evidence of a number of French witnesses, that the count had with her for years as man and wife, was held to establish fully the claims of the countess and her children to be the lawful wife and issue of the late Ivan Cheraski. Tokhtamish, I may mention, gave his evidence very willingly, as it was perfectly certain that the countess would never marry him, and he could not marry anybody else while she was supposed to be his wife.

On the morality of the transaction I pronounce no opinion and abandon that problem to such casuists as may still be extant.

The countess left Russia shortly after she had gained her lawsuit, and was married about a year afterward to Edward Marston, who partly through his own abilities and partly through the assistance of her fortune, became one of the leading physicians in London.—W. H. Stackpoole in Time for May.

Speaking of equines here are some directions for taming, taken from "Rich on Artistic Horse-Shoeing," which may (and may not) prove trustworthy: "To tame a horse, halter him and then take the warts from his leg; dry and powder; then blow it up his nose. Then take oil of arodium drop a few drops in your hand and rub it over his nose. This will make him follow you, and you can do anything you wish."

The Injuns never teched him,
Nor the b'ars;
An' the rattlers never bit him,
An' the train robbers couldn't get him
On the cars.
'Twas a frigid day an' drizzly
When the rocky mountain grizzly
Ever crep' within a rod of Jim, the scout;
An' the catamount an' bison
Never teched him more than pizen,
Which they allus more prefer to do without.

But he moved into the city
Just for fun;
An' he sold his big six-shooter,
An' he thought it would not do ter
Keep his gun.
But a muscular garroter,
Who was not a legal voter,
Robbed him of his watch and wallet like a child;
Then a gaspipe overloaded
Bust, and Jim he got exploded,
An' came down considerable permiscuous and riled.

An' the bunco steerers fleeced him
An' the gamins uster hoot him
An' a slugger tried to shoot him
T' other night.
An' a hoodlum tried to skin him,
An' an injine ran agin him,
An' a herdic an' a hoss car an' a dray;
An' agin, a little later,
In a rotten elevator,
He fell down thirteen stories in one day

An' his house it caught afire
T' other night;
An' his gas meter exploded
(Jim didn't know it was loaded).
Awful sight!
An' his house was widely scattered,
O'er the country it was bespattered,
In a shower of chunks and cinders so they said.
Jim was so completely shivered,
He hain't never been diskivered,
But the coroner concluded he was dead.

An Unsuspected Heroine.

When I hired lodgings at Madam Hampton's, I had no idea that she owned so precious a thing as a daughter. Not that it would have made any difference if I had known it. I had become indifferent to women; they interested me only as a trivial study. You will say that woman as a study is too dangerous, but it had never proved so with me. In the meantime I neither sought nor avoided them; those whom fate threw in my way I placed under my mental microscope, not caring much for what it revealed. My indifference, however, did not arise from any lost illusions. I had never been in love, and it never occurred to me that the thing was possible. I had been on friendly terms with blonde and brunette, with the prude and the coquette, the clever and the designing; but I had forgotten their existence half an hour later.

Madam Hampton herself never left her room; she was doubtless dying; but she had been so long about it, and made so little circumstance about it, that nobody gave it a thought, it would seem. She saw her lodgers and arranged terms, and sent in the bills; and yet the house and all its appointments seemed to share the order of the planetary system. The motive power was madam's daughter. I involuntarily pictured her, since we always picture those who appeal, individually to us in anyway, as a coarse-featured woman, with "silver threads among the gold," a face more or less wrinkled, a sharp voice, big round hands, and a genius for snubbing the servants and haggling with the butcher and baker.

On entering madam's room one day, in order to settle my account, according to the custom of the house, behold a slender being before the open fire, with one tiny hand on the mantel, while a lavender morning gown turned the knot of yellow hair at the back of the head, from which some curls escaped, into pure gold. There was an air of luxury and leisure about which was simply delicious in view of the facts.

"My daughter," said madam presently. "Estelle, this is Mr. Van Huysam; you have heard me speak of him."

Estelle turned a beautiful, haughty face in my direction, bowed slightly, smiled vaguely. "Indeed I might say I have heard you speak of no one else." Plainly the old lady had been singing my praises, and the young lady did not fancy the tone.

I do not know what chord thrilled in my heart at these words, in that soft minor voice, capable of all melody, of that terse expression, nor how I got myself out of the room. A man who has received a fatal bullet in the breast does not recognize the sensation, for the reason that he has never experienced it before; he does not know its import. We met often after this, always by accident, it would seem, on the staircase, in the hall, and finally one night I made so bold as to knock at the door of her music-room. She welcomed me with her haughty cordiality, if haughtiness can be cordial.

There were three or four young men already in possession, but she placed her seat near my own, and while she anon threw out javelins of wit for the general benefit, I received the lion's share of attention. This was flattering to my amourpropre. But still, whenever I repeated my call, I had always to wrestle with a handful of younger men for the supremacy. I must confess that before I reached this point I had been obliged to wrestle with myself to overcome prejudice. A Van Huysam in love with his landlady's daughter was an anomaly. What would my family and friends say to such an affair? With what eyes would they regard it? What would Miss Douglass think, for whom I had been destined, but who had been a hobbledehoy girl of thirteen when I had last seen her? Of course she could care nothing for me; it would be a wound to her vanity at the most. I had never intended to marry her; I had never consented, in fact; that bony, shy school-girl, with the big eyes and the lank figure, had never appealed to me; I had never been able to forgive her for stammering and blushing.

Besides, there had been some rumor that the coffers of the family had suffered during their sojourn abroad, and I had lost sight of them through their own negligence. But a landlord's daughter! The idea would wither all my acquaintances. However, love not only laughs at locksmiths, but at one's relations. When I sunned myself in Estelle's presence, I cared no more for the world's opinion, or for that of any Van Huysam but myself, than for the inhabitants of Flatland; but once away from that subtle magnetism, than my poles changed. I saw a thousand reasons for giving up what one does not possess. Such a thing as a Van Huysam marrying out of his sphere had never been known in the family annals. But how did I know that Estelle would marry me? To be sure, if I had been quite certain of that, perhaps I should have hesitated to proceed further. The far-off, unattainable, and dim is dear to the soul of man,—at least till it is his to take or leave. One day when we were reading a new poem together, a card was brought in.

"Tell Mr. Chester that I am engaged, and cannot see him to-night," I overheard her say to the servant. "Mr. Chester does not appreciate our author," she apologized to me, "and I am not self-sacrificing enough to accept him in exchange for Browning." It occurred to me at that time that there were other young men belonging to aristocratic families who had no fear of a mesalliance with a landlady's daughter, although, to be sure, they might be simply amusing themselves, as gilded youth were wont to do. Estelle would never go out with me; she had no chaperon, she said. I wondered what my sister-in-law would answer should I write her to chaperon my landlady's daughter to "Lohengrin she who chaperoned only the very elect, so to speak.

One evening the conversation drifted into the subject of marriage. Mr. Chester and some others were present, and lead the themes. "I would marry the woman I loved," said Mr. Chester, "If she were a beggar, and my father disinherited me on the spot."

"Beggary signifies nothing," returned another. "One would not ask, has she a dot, but has she blue blood."

"An ancestral tree, in short, with more roots than branches," spoke a third. "As for myself, I confess I should prefer my wife to belong to the impecunious old families rather than to the nouveau ricue. Poor Bishop, how this world came down upon him when he fell in love with a shopgirl, with neither blood or bullion, his mother especially! But Bishop stood to his guns; it must have taken a lot of pluck to weather all he did from friend or foe."

"You call that pluck?" said Chester, "I call it obstinacy, in his case. It was such an easy thing for Bishop to fall in love that he might have pleased his mother and given up the girl."

"And what do you think, Mr. Van Huysam?" asked Estelle.

"I? I think Bishop was a fool; that is—I mean—there may be exceptional shopgirls, who have all the refinement and cultivation, all the traditions of good-breeding, in the world; but Bishop's choice was not one of these. He was simply beautiful, and he was a fool to allow himself, at his age, to be hoodwinked, so to speak, by mere flesh and blood."

"I quite agree with you," she said.

"I could have bitten my tongue out when I called Bishop a fool—in fact the whole subject seemed malapropros to me, and I went away with a sense of defeat. But how could I tell her that, although I might draw the line at the shopgirl, marrying a landlady's daughter was quite another affair? Every day to be sure, I made up my mind that I would seek Estelle no more, that the difficulties in the case were too great to be surmounted; but every day, all the same, found me beside her, without self-denial enough to resign the infinite charm of her presence, and yet too weak of will to accept all the consequences of such an alliance.

You would say that if I could thus judge and weigh circumstances I was not in love. But what is it, when all your soul is saturated with thoughts of one being, when you seem to be not so much yourself as another? The heroine in "Wuthering Heights" asks, "Do I love Heathcliffe? I am Heathcliffe;" and so, I am sure, I felt with regard to Estelle. I am certain that in time I should have overcome all obstacles, that the nobility within me would have got the better of any meaner qualities; but every man's nature or temperament is in a manner his own fate. Had I not been quite certain at this time that I pleased Estelle, in spite of her gentle hauteur, perhaps I should have been able to overcome my social scruples sooner. A few weeks later I was called away on business, and it was a month or more before I found it convenient to return. During this time I had written to Estelle more than once, without, however, receiving any reply. Yet I was sure she was mine; that I had only to speak; and I meant to speak at last—to speak so eloquently that she would not remember the silence had been long.

I just went to pay my respects to Madame Hampton.

"I have been making my will," she said, after a little.

"Your will Madame?"

"Yes. I have other heirs besides Estelle, who may dispute it. They will contend that I am—what they may call a 'crank.' But I had a method in my madness. I beg you to be my executor."

"I am at your service, Madame."

"Thank you. I leave the bulk of my property to Estelle."

"The bulk!" I repeated. "You have found your business remunerative?"

She chuckled audibly. "I have found it entertaining enlightening," She answered. "It has paid me? Yes. I have discovered who are my friends. I must tell you that Estelle is not my daughter."

"Not your daughter?"

"Are you disappointed? When her father died abroad, insolvent, I was at hand. We were both drinking the same waters at some German spa. Long ago I had been going to marry Mr. Douglass, her father.

"Mr. Douglass?

"Yes. Does the name offend you? When he died I promised to take Estelle if I might give her my name and money. There was literally nothing left from the estate for her to live upon. However, when I returned from Europe I returned a pauper, so to speak. Do you follow me? I allowed myself a little masquerade I deceived even Estelle, but I have never deprived her of a luxury; even the lace on her handkerchief is real. She often marvels that the business is so good. I have held the purse, and she has been glad to work with me. But my friends were too indignant at my misfortunes to lend me aid. What business had I to lose the money which they might have inherited? And a daughter! They wanted me to place Estelle in a shop—Estelle! How I laughed in my sleeve! I am now about to retire from business, the doctor has advised me to make my will. You will find Estelle in the music-room."

I entered the music room without knocking according to my habit. Estelle sat with her mandolin on her lap, but every chord had snapped in the last stormy touch.

"You have returned," she said, smiling as a ghost may smile.

"Yes. I have come to tell you—what you already know—I love you, Estelle. I have loved you since I first met you; yes, and before. I loved you before I knew you existed. It must be so, because I have never loved until now. You do not doubt it?"

"No, I do not doubt it; I know that you love me, Mr. Van Huysam; and I know that your love must be great, since it has overcome every conventional scruple in your heart."

"My darling Estelle, I was sure you loved me; it is that which has given me courage." I would have taken her in my arms, and kissed that perfect cheek where the rose was just beginning to blossom, but she escaped me.

"You knew that I loved you," she repeated. "Mr. Van Huysam, I don't mind confessing that there was indeed a time when I loved you better than life. At least I believed so. At that moment I thought you loved me.

"I did, I do love you, Estelle," I protested.

"Yes. Then I would have loved you forever and ever. Then I could have died for you, lived for you. One day I awoke. I saw that you could not love me, or nothing on earth could keep you silent. You did not see how I suffered. Then my heart broke. Do you know what it is to have a broken heart? It is to have lost the power to love anyone again. I have read somewhere that a man never loves the same woman twice."

"But you—I love you. Listen, Estelle. Time will—"

But she smiled sadly. "I thank you; I forgive you," she said; "I would love you if I could."

And then the servant announced Mr. Chester.—Harper's Bazar.

A Potato Trust.

The six largest potato dealers in Boston have combined in a trust known as the Consolidated Produce company, lately organized at Portland, under the laws of this state, with a capital stock of $400,000, of which $100,000 is preferred. The object of this trust is said to be to regulate the price of potatoes, which for the past few years has been subject to so much competition and price-cutting as to take away all the profits of the business. The members of the company disclaim all intention of creating a monopoly, but the ten smaller dealers in Boston are not re-assured by the report that the directors of the new concern are to meet daily to regulate and make prices for potatoes. It is expected to have things in working order by next month. Dividends are restricted to 7 per cent. per annum on either preferred or common stock, but the whole 7 will have to be paid on the preferred before any on the common is due. This new movement is of no less interest to Maine farmers than to the smaller Boston dealers. It is in their power to break it up, if they see fit.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

Swallows Invade a Steamer at Sea.

From the London Daily Telegraph.

A rather curious episode in natural history occurred the other day on board the French steamboat Abd-el-Kader during the passage from Marseilles to Algiers. Just as the vessel was about two hours out the sky became quite black with swallows. It was then about 6 o'clock in the evening. The birds alighted in thousands on the sails, ropes and yards of the Abd-el-Kader. After a perky survey of the deck from their eminences aloft they descended coolly on deck, hopped about among the sailors and passengers and eventually found their way into the cabin both fore and aft. The birds were evidently fatigued after a long flight and allowed themselves to be caught by the people of the ship, who gave them a welcome reception and provided them with food, which they enjoyed heartily. The little winged strangers remained all night on the vessel, and in the morning, at 7 o'clock, the head lookout bird no doubt sighted the Balearic Isles, for the whole flock made for land, after having spent a comfortable and refreshing night on board ship.

He was twenty-two years old and unmarried. The body is in the hands of the coroner but after an inquest it will be sent to his home at Fargo.

The steam pleasure yacht Enid was struck by steamer James W. Baldwin a mile north of Newburg, N. Y. There were eight persons in the boat, and two of them, Miss Annie Miller and the wife of Benjamin B. Odell, Jr., were drowned. Miss Miller was the daughter of David Miller of New York and Mrs. Odell wife of the Republican state committeeman in the Fifteenth congressional district.

For some time there has been trouble brewing in the congregation of Latter Day Saints near Glen Easton, near Wheeling, W. V. While the congregation was holding a meeting at the house of Aron Farris, an aged member of the flock, the trouble culminated in a riot in which two men were probably fatally wounded and six or eight others is stabbed or otherwise badly hurt.

Lizzie Bartleson, the six-year-old daughter of ex-Sheriff Bartleson of Fergus Falls, Minn., had a leg cut off below the knee by being run over by a car on the Northern Pacific road. She went down to the depot to bid a friend good-bye and stepped onto the platform of a caboose car. The engine was switching and backed up, jarring her off and one truck ran over her leg. She is doing well.

Dispatches from central and eastern Illinois report a very heavy rainfall. Country roads are in bad condition, railroads somewhat troubled and crops in many places very badly damaged. In some places whole fields of oats and corn were beaten down. Tuscola reports the heaviest floods since 1875. From 8,000 to 15,000 acres of growing crops are under water in one county alone.

The last train on the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, loaded with Chicago delegates, ran into a freight train near Chicago Junction, Ohio, while going at the rate of forty miles an hour. The engines, baggage car and freight cars were demolished and the track torn up for a long distance. The engineer was fatally hurt and the passengers scratched and bruised. All were taken back to Fostoria and around to Columbus. The road was blockaded for twelve hours.

The attorneys of the murderer Maxwell called on Gov. Morehouse, at Jefferson City, Mo., and submitted a request, backed by several letters from prominent gentlemen in various parts of the state, for a respite of 60 days. The Governor refused the request, but notified the attorneys that he will hear their appeal for commutation of sentence on July 9. If this appeal is not granted Maxwell will be hanged in St. Louis July 13. Henry Langruf, who murdered his sweetheart, Annie Tisch, will also be hanged on the same day.

The Criminal Calendar.

A thief entered the crown prince of Sweden's apartments in the hotel at Franzensbad and secured jewelry worth $100,000, with which he escaped.

George Burton and George S. Arnold got into a quarrel at Miniture, Neb. over a bet of $12.50, when Arnold shot Burton through the heart, killing him instantly.

Chas. A. Pilcher, teller of the Union bank, Providence, R. I., absconded. He took about all the valuables he could lay his hands on, even to pennies. It is said he took $500,000 in bonds and all the cash in the vault.

Charles Deckler, a farmer living near Buena Vista, Ill., shot and instantly killed his wife and then committed suicide by shooting himself three times and cutting his own throat with a razor. Deckler was a drinking man and had frequently beaten his wife and threatened to kill her. He leaves a family of nine children.

A disastrous fire has been raging at the town of Sundsvall, the center of a large lumber district on the Gulf of Bothnia in Sweden, and the town has been nearly destroyed. The damage will reach $5,000,000. Immense tracts of forest land have been burned over. A drouth has prevailed for a long time, rendering the wood very dry.

The grand jury of the Franklin, Kentucky circuit court returned indictments against James W. Tate, late state treasurer, for embezzlement. The total amount is $404,085.85. Embezzlement is not an extraditable crime, and, as it is now known that the family of Mr. Tate are in communication with him, it is supposed they will soon make his whereabouts public.

Mathias Schreiver was found in the rear of 204 Mohawk street Chicago with his clothing on fire. He was horribly burned and died later. His clothing had apparently been soaked with oil while he was laying in his yard drunk. He made an antemortem statement involving August Herbst. The latter and Schreiver's wife and her mother have been arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the horrible crime.

A telegram from Pulaski county Mo., says a bold outrage was committed there by an organized band similar to the White Caps of Indiana. About midnight a party of masked riders rode up to the house of Charles Gross, a wealthy farmer, and, dragging him from the house, carried him a mile away and there whipped him to death. The alleged cause is the divulging of secrets of the Agricultural Wheel, a secret organization. Gross was flayed alive.

Yankton, Dakota is in the throes of excitement over three swindles in as many days. H. S. Rice, formerly of Brown's valley, Neb., is accused of having passed a bogus check. He was arrested in Omaha and brought back to answer. J. Fitch Smith, jeweler, disappeared, so did several watches and other property. Thomas E. Hall, a confidence man, induced Yankton county farmers to sign notes by saying that they were contracts. Hall was arrested, brought back from Sioux City and compelled to return the notes.

The notorious gambler, Bell, and one Atwater, late of Iowa City, Iowa, ran a den together. The other night a traveling salesman from the Consolidated Tank Line company, of Sioux City, went in to buck the tiger. The gamblers got his money. He says they robbed him of it and thereupon he knocked Bell down and stabbed Atwater, inflicting three bad flesh wounds. Marshall Foster arrested the oil man, taking him to the Wright House, from there to the jail. He broke and ran when Foster fired at him three times, the third shot taking effect in the leg.

Michael Hill, convicted of killing his sister's illegitimate child was brought before Judge Farmer for sentence. Beyond a little palelessness and a tense expression he showed no signs of agitation. The court, after hearing his counsel's pleas for leniency, pronounced sentence of imprisonment for life at hard labor in the penitentiary. The prisoner gave no sign that he realized what the sentence implied for him, and he was removed to the jail. There he broke down and wept like a child. He told the jailer that if any in the court room thought to see him break down there he guessed they were disappointed.

The third jail delivery within a month occurred at Superior, Wis. One of the three prisoners confined in the corridor cell asked the watchman to be allowed to step out for a minute, feigning to require fresh air. The watchman consented, supposing the remainder of the prisoners in the cell to be asleep, but the door was no sooner opened than the men dashed out and overpowered the watchman, whom they beat to insensibility and gagged. They then attempted to set fire to the building by overturning an oil lamp, but the blaze was extinguished by a vagrant prisoner before much damage was done. The names are Spot, Murphy and White. The first two were notorious criminals and were serving long terms for numerous crimes, and White had just been removed from Minnesota on a requisition, and was serving out a term for twice acting as accomplice in the delivery of prisoners from the jail.

Personal Notes.

Gen. Sheridan's continued prostration causes the most intense anxiety to his friends, and the effort will be made to remove him to Nonquitt, Buzzard's bay, Mass., at all risks. It is no longer denied that in this removal there is bound up the last hope of prolonging his life. The United States steamer Swatara has been detailed for this purpose by the secretary of the navy.

Tony Hart, the comedian, who in partnership with Ned Harrigan, made a national reputation, was committed to the state lunatic hospital at Worcester, Mass. Dr. Park, superintendent of the hospital, says the case is an incurable one of paralysis. Tony has not been on the stage for over a year, and before that time signs of mental unsoundness had manifested themselves. Since his retirement he has grown steadily worse.

A woman of eighty years appeared in the probate court at Chicago and claimed to be widow of Walter S. Babcock, the Chicago lumber merchant, who was mysteriously shot at Gardner last August, supposedly by his paramour, Miss Sarah Dodge. The claimant made affidavit that she was married to Babcock in 1871 by a Chicago minister. Babcock's family and heirs always understood that he lived and died a single man. The judge will investigate.

Foreign News.

The Duke of Marlborough will be married to the young widow of Hooker Hammersley, of New York, who enjoys an annuity of $100,000 from her late husband's estate.

There is a good deal of excitement at Winnipeg over the recent rich gold discovery in McMickon's gold mine on the Lake of the Woods. The mine is the old George Heenan mine, and has always been regarded as a pretty rich one. Mr. McMicken succeeded in interesting Mr. Pugh, a St. Paul capitalist, in the mine, and Dennis Ryan, a St. Paul millionaire, who is at Winnipeg, will leave for Rat Portage to take a look over the mines. It is probable that he may put some capital into the field. The probabilities seem to indicate a mining boom in that district.

General News Items.

The twenty-first annual reunion of the old First regiment of Minnesota volunteers, which was celebrated at Lake Minnetonka by the veterans and their friends, as the guests of George A. Brackett, was a most pleasant affair and was attended by some 400 people.

Agent Ronan, of the Flathead Indians, has issued an order to white men to take all cattle off the Montana reservation before July 18, or the Indians will round them up and drive them off. The order has been issued in compliance with instructions from Indian Commissioner Atkins.

A great many Indians who have farms in Iowa and Nebraska are now in the vicinity of Black River Falls, Wis., to receive their annuity from the government and will remain through the blue-berry season, when they will return to gather their crops and spend the winter where it is warmer.

Emissaries from Utah, calling themselves Latter Day Saints, are working arduously in the vicinity of Rochester, Minn., preaching in the school houses throughout country districts. If they remain for any length of time it is more than likely that the threats of tar and feathers made by substantial men in the county will be put into execution.

At a meeting of the citizens of Madelia and vicinity, resolutions were passed declaring the grasshoppers in Otter Tail county, Minn., a menace to the welfare of the entire state, and cordially endorsing the action taken by Gov. A. R. McGill, and that it is deemed best to take immediate action in every county, city and village in the state looking toward the destruction of these pests.

It is given out indirectly that the Northern Pacific company will close its fiscal year with a surplus of $500,000 in excess of fixed charges and all other expenses. The year will, it is said, be the banner one in its history. In addition to the fifty locomotives that have been ordered the directors contemplate another thousand freight cars besides those now under contract for building.

The grasshoppers in Northern Minnesota for the past week have seemed to be idle, probably occasioned by the warfare that is urged against them. On one day there were in operation 125 pans which caught daily an average of from three to four bushels. In addition to the pans there are several other contrivances being used for catching them without the use of tar or oil. It looks as if the hoppers were well in hand and that the large majority of the crops would be saved. The committee have decided to pay $1 a bushel for them.

A conflict occurred between two tribes of Alaska Indians, the Chilcats and Sitkas. A large party of prospectors started up the Yukon with a tribe of Sitka Indians, under Chief George, as freighters. A combat resulted, in which the chief of the Chilcats was killed. The Indians demanded life for life, and chased the Sitkas into Haines, a white settlement. The whites protected the life of Chief George through the day, but at night he was murdered by the stealthy Chilcats. Fearing a massacre, the whites sent to the coast for help, which arrived just in time in the shape of a man-of-war.

Emilsen Loutzensheiser, who mysteriously disappeared several weeks ago, has just returned to his home at Canton, Ohio, ragged and dirty, relates a remarkable tale. He says that on the day of the disappearance a tramp approached him at the Ft. Wayne depot, and, pulling out a handkerchief, held it to his face. He became unconscious; and when he recovered he was in a cattle car with three tramps and two other boys. He was kept in the car until Altoona, Pa., was reached when he and his companions were taken to a house in the woods, where there were 10 other boys and two tramps guarding them. They had all been kidnapped and held for ransom. Young Loutzensheiser escaped, and reached Altoona and informed the police, who arrested the tramps and set the boys free.

A woman wearing a heavy black veil, which she never removed, appeared in Black River Falls, about two weeks ago, and after stopping at a hotel and taking three houses in succession, rented a cottage in the midst of the residence portion of the East side. She bought and placed in the house a quantity of fine furniture, and was seen to display a heavy bundle of greenbacks. She seldom came out except at night, when she sat on the piazza for hours with her heavy veil drawn close, while in the day time she placed lighted candles in the windows and remained indoors. She had allowed nobody to see her face. The neighborhood was already wild with curiosity when one evening the veiled woman was heard walking about the cottage moaning, cursing and shrieking that her husband, whom she had basely murdered, had come for his revenge. The neighbors made complaint to the probate judge and two physicians examined the woman and pronounced her insane. She is a Mrs. Bennett, aged about forty. Her home is in Milwaukee, where she says she has a son. She was placed in charge of the sheriff.

Cleveland Formally Notified.

The committee appointed by the St. Louis democratic national convention to visit Washington and inform Mr. Cleveland that he had been renominated for President, performed that duty in a formal manner, whereupon the president, in reply, spoke as follows:

I cannot but be profoundly impressed when I see about me the messengers of the national Democracy bearing its summons to duty. The political party to which I owe allegiance, both honors and commands me. It places in my hand its proud standard and bids me bear it high at the front in a battle which wages bravely, because conscious of right; confidently, because its trust is in the people, and soberly, because it comprehends the obligation which success imposes. The message which you bring awakens within me the liveliest sense of personal gratitude and satisfaction, and the honor which you tender me is in itself so great that there might well be no room for any other sentiment. And yet I cannot rid myself of grave and serious thoughts when I remember that party supremacy is not alone involved in the conflict which presses upon us, but that we struggle to secure and save the cherished institutions, the welfare and happiness of a nation of free men. Familiarity with the great office which I hold has but added to my apprehension of its sacred character and the consecration demanded of him who assumes its immense responsibilities. It is the repository of the people's will and power. Within its vision should be the protection and welfare of the humblest citizen, and with quick ear it should catch from the remotest corner of the land the plea of the people for justice and right. For the sake of the people he who holds this office of theirs should resist every encroachment upon its legitimate functions, and for the sake of the integrity and usefulness of the office, it should be kept near the people and be administered in full sympathy with their wants and needs. This occasion reminds me most vividly of the scene when, four years ago, I received a message from my party similar to that which you now deliver. With all that has passed since that day, I can truly say that the feeling of awe with which I heard the summons then, is intensified many fold when it is repeated now. Four years ago, I knew that our chief executive office, if not carefully guarded, might drift little by little away from the people to whom it belonged, and become a perversion of all it ought to be, but I did not know how much its moorings had already been loosened. I knew four years ago how well devised were the principles of true Democracy for the successful operation of a government by the people, but I did not know how absolutely necessary the application then was for the restoration to the people of their safety and prosperity. I knew then that abuses and extravagance had crept into the management of public affairs, but I did not know their numerous forms nor the tenacity of their grasp. I knew then something of the bitterness of partisan obstruction, but I did not know how bitter, how reckless and how shameless it could be. I knew, too, that the American people were patriotic and just, but I did not know how grandly they loved their country, nor how noble and generous they were. I shall not dwell upon the acts and the policy of the administration now drawing to its close. Its record is open to every citizen of the land. And I will not be denied the privilege of asserting at this time that in the exercise of the functions of the high trust confided to me, I have yielded obedience only to the constitution and the solemn obligation of my oath of office. I have done those things which, in the light of the understanding God has given me, seemed most conducive to the welfare of my countrymen and the promotion of good government. I would not, if I could, for myself, nor for you, avoid a single consequence of a fair interpretation of my course. But it remains for me to say to you, and through you, to the Democracy of the nation, that I accept the nomination with which they have honored me, and that I will in due time signify such acceptance in the usual formal manner.

Another Triple Murder.

Minneapolis was the scene of another terrible murder. About nine o'clock in the evening a man and woman were walking down Third street, when a man walked rapidly up and confronted them. A report rang out and the escort dropped the woman's arm and fell to the sidewalk, with a bullet in his brain. "Oh, God! don't shoot!" The woman screamed this out, and turning, ran back a few steps and turned into a small alleyway, pursued by the assassin or the avenger. She had gone but two rods when he overtook her, and from a distance of only two feet, turned the revolver upon her and fired. The ball crashed through her head and she fell dead. The revolver clicked again as the hammer was raised, and the double murderer rushed still further back into the alley, entered the rear building and turned the weapon upon himself. Three reports followed in rapid succession, and, dropping the revolver, the assassin and would-be-suicide fell to the ground. The five reports had rung out loud and clear on the night air, and in a few moments the sidewalk and street were thronged by a dense crowd, which quickly assembled. Not an officer was in sight and the people stood aghast, without daring to touch one of the three bodies. For twenty minutes they laid there, until word had been sent to the central station and the patrol wagon summoned. The woman was stone dead and was not touched. The man on the sidewalk gave signs of life, and was removed to his boarding place.

The story as it was gradually developed is as follows: Ed Robinson is a teamster. About a year ago he married a young girl from Howard Lake, but they separated seven months ago. Nick Weiss had made her acquaintance and was walking down Third street with her when the shooting occurred. From the scraps of talk that dropped from Robinson after the shooting it seems he had warned his wife against going with Weiss, and had got the revolver with the express purpose of shooting them.

There is about an even chance that Robinson may recover. He never lost consciousness and talked quite a little. He said he had evidence that Weiss was his wife's paramour, and he had several times warned them not to meet.

"Do you regret the deed?" was asked him, and he replied that he did not. "I did it deliberately after a fair warning. I hope I will die and they will die with me."

Robinson is known as a bad character, given to drink. He was in the woods near Aitkin a year ago last winter, and had the general reputation of being a hard lot.

Fearful Loss of Life.

Telegraphic communication, interrupted for several days by the floods, has been restored and the particulars of the terrible disaster on the line of the Mexican Central railway, particularly at Leon and Silao, are obtained. The table lands between the City of Mexico and Seataeticas have been visited by unprecedented rains, causing the Silaos river to flow out of its banks, breaking at the north end of the town and passing through the streets with irrisistible force and volume. Most houses being of adobe, as soon as they were saturated with water they began to fail. About 325 houses have been destroyed. The standing buildings are occupied by homeless people who are unable to obtain anything to eat except watermellons and fruit found floating in the water. It was learned that the floods had been more destructive in Leon than in Silao. It seems on Monday, the 18th, the river broke over its dykes, and not withstanding all efforts to check its course it made rapid headway and finally flooded the city. People believing themselves secure from the flood went to bed in those parts of town where the water had not found its way. The steady downfall of rain with the extensive water bed of the outlying country increased the flow of the river and rapidly extended its channel until over half of Leon was under water. Houses tumbled rapidly and the loss of life commenced, unparalled in the history of the great inundations of modern times. As the building fell the unfortunate sleepers were either crushed to death or drowned. One whole night of terror followed. Men, women and children fled to the streets in their night clothes, some to find shelter on higher ground, and others to be swept away by the flood. Next morning rain was still falling and there had been no perceptible decrease in the stream of water. A mammoth lake extended its length and breadth to all points of the compass. Its monotonous appearance was occasionally broken by half submerged houses and highlands cropping above its placid surface. Where the houses had stood the night previous, water was surging in its flight to lower grounds. It is estimated that 700 people perished. There is a strong stench from heaps of rubbish that once formed houses, and one is led to believe there must be bodies buried under them. There are also bodies still floating in the water. One hundred and seven bodies have been recovered without moving any ruins of houses, wherein are supposed to be hundreds of bodies buried. The destruction of houses is estimated at 2,000, and loss at $2,000,000. The last reports from Leon are heartrending. The whole population are busily working into the ruins of the fallen houses. Nearly everybody has lost relations or friends, and those who have not, have seen their earthly possessions disappear in a night. The estimate of loss of life and property given are the smallest reported, and are certainly within the bounds of truth.

Sustains the Road.

The interstate commerce commission has rendered an opinion in the case of The Business Men's Association of the State of Minnesota, petitioner, against The Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company. It says:

All that we can decide in this proceeding now is that the rule insisted upon by the petitioner, that the rate per ton per mile, taken as a basis between Chicago and St Peter, must be adopted as the standard at stations between St. Peter and Pierre, and that the latter rates must decrease relatively for the greater distance in the same proportion, as between Chicago to St. Peter, is one that in the existing conditions of transportation along the line of this railroad, upon the evidence in this proceeding, cannot be sustained. As the complaint is based upon this ground alone, and was so tried by the parties and heard by the commission, it results that this petition must be dismissed.

The commission has also rendered an opinion in the case of the same petitioner against the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway company, in which the complaint is in the same general line as in the preceding case. After an exhaustive review of the law and evidence the commission orders that the petition be dismissed.

Lynching in Kansas.

Wallace Mitchell plead guilty at Syracuse, Kansas, to the murder of Oscar Johnson and the attempted murder of August Johnson. At the conclusion of the testimony he was remanded to jail until the September term of court. The cold-blooded recital of his deed by the prisoner had an exciting effect on the people, and it was easy to see that a storm was brewing and that summary justice was to be visited on the guilty man after dark. Matters came more to a focus, and about midnight a body of men, numbering a hundred or more, gathered around the water tank, and under the lead of a captain proceeded to the vicinity of the jail and demanded admittance of the sheriff. This he refused, and declared his intention to protect his prisoner at all hazards. Two men were again sent to demand the keys, but the sheriff was gone. He was soon overhauled, the doors unlocked and the culprit taken to the place where the murder was committed and given all the time he desired for prayer and confession. He then made his last prayer, and hung a lifeless corpse from the cross piece of a telegraph pole. Mitchell's crime was the murder of a little boy twelve years old and the attempted murder of his father for money, and the endeavor to complicate another man in the hideous crime.

Familiar Kentucky Episode.

A letter to the Associated Press from Hartlan, Kentucky, says that Marion Stewart shot and killed his wife and his brother at their home near that place. Marion Stewart, John Stewart, Tip Osborne and Jeff Hall were playing cards when a dispute arose over some point in the game. All had been drinking and the dispute grew into a wrangle and blows passed. Marion then drew a navy revolver and shot John through the brain. He turned to shoot Osborne, who is his stepson. Osborne ran, followed by Stewart. Mrs. Stewart interfered and got a bullet in the temple. Osborne by this time had escaped and Stewart turned his attention to Hall. Hall got away, but came back half an hour later, when Stewart again tried to kill him, but Hall again escaped. Seeing his wife lying dead outside the door and his brother in a dying condition inside, Stewart turned to his eldest daughter, a girl 14 years old and said: "Good-by; do the best you can for the children" and started up the mountain side. The children carried their dead mother into the house, where their father's brother was rapidly dying. Mrs. Stewart leaves seven children, the oldest 14 years of age and the youngest a babe nursing. John Stewart leaves a wife and small family. No attempts at arrest have been made, although Tip Osborne has sworn vengeance against Stewart for killing his mother.

Northwestern Postoffices.

Under the present adjustment of post masters' salaries there are fifty-five offices of the presidential grade in Minnesota. There has been a very general increase of salaries in the state. Duluth secures the largest addition of any of the offices—$3,000—and this carries it into the ranks of the first-class postoffices. Both St. Paul and Minneapolis gain a single hundred. The following secure an addition to the salary account of two hundred dollars: Custer, Morris, Redwood Falls and Tower. Two offices, Detroit City and Pipestone, lose a hundred dollars. One Healthy American.

A thin, delicate-looking woman sat in a horse-car one evening recently, and next her sat a native of the Queen's realm. The window behind the Briton was open and the cool wind blew in on the woman, making her shiver. At last she said, in a ladylike way, "Won't you be kind enough to close the window behind you, as it makes me cold?" It would hardly have caused the man any inconvenience to grant this request, but he replied harshly, "I prefer it open; you Americans can't stand anything; you all seem to have consumption." The other passengers in the car were astounded at his incivility, and there were many angry glances cast at the royal subject. Finally a gentleman rose on the opposite side of the car, and, approaching the Englishman with about 220 pounds avoirdupois, leaned over him and grasping the window slammed it down with vigor; then he remarked: "Now, my friend, if you think all Americans are afflicted with consumption you just raise that window again. I am an American." The little woman blushed, the other passengers smiled, the American returned to his seat, and the Briton looked out of the window and thought.—Argonaut.

REPUBLICAN COLUMN.

Cleveland and the Confederates.

The Hartford Post says that if Thurman had a war record Cleveland might be left to attack it in a pension veto. But Cleveland would never veto a bill to pension Confederate sympathizers.

Democratic Arithmetic.

"Delegate Lightfoot," says the Houston (Texas) Post, "pledged Texas to the Democracy this year by 200,000 majority. These figures are rather stiff, but we can do it." why not indeed? It's only a question of the simplest arithmetic, and you must have just as expert counters as Louisiana.

Cleveland's Dilemma.

Let no one be surprised if President Cleveland is an unusually long time in preparing his letter accepting a renomination. The fact that he is on record as emphatically opposed to a president running for a second term will render it extremely difficult for him to convince people that he is not sacrificing his principle to a love for spoils that grows by what it feeds on.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Cleveland Administration.

The government of the United States is controlled by confederate soldiers. I expect to see the time when the cause of the confederates will be looked upon as that of true constitutional liberty the world over.—Rebel Brigadier General Bradley T. Johnson.

A Workingman on Free Trade.

Now, workingmen, if you want free trade: commence now to economize on the European plan. Keep meat off your table, brush up your working clothes for Sunday; crowd your family into one room. Don't read anything but free trade papers; you might learn something useful. Tell your employers to reduce your wages to the precise figure paid for such work in other countries. Then you will be fully equipped for the change contemplated by your free trade friends and prepared to accept the servile place and degraded condition in life which it has pleased not Almighty God, but the framers of the Mills tariff bill, to make for you.—James Johnson in New York Sun. (Democratic.)

Indorse Everything.

In a few words this is what the Democratic party says:

"We indorse our platform of 1884 as interpreted by the President's message."

To be consistent it should go on and say:

"We indorse civil service reform as interpreted and administered by President Cleveland.

We indorse Mugwumpery as interpreted by George William Curtis.

We indorse a free ballot and an honest count as interpreted in the Solid South.

We indorse the bible as interpreted by all our leading infidels.

We'll indorse anything that can be interpreted to suit everybody.—Detroit Tribune.

What Can They Do About It?

The painful truth is that we doubt if a single independent voter in this state, of the thousand who supported President Cleveland in 1884, any longer attaches any importance to the utterance of the members of the Administration on the subject of civil service reform, or any longer refuses to believe that the President's promises and professions have been violated or disregarded on a great scale, with the utmost boldness, in sundry places and in divers manners, and that men like Judge Maynard and Surveyor Beattie have actually been detailed or told off to practice as much civil service abuse as can be readily concealed or disguised when they are found out and exposed.

Gen. Sherman's Opinion.

Wm. T. Sherman said in New York "I think there could not be a more powerful ticket than Harrison and Morton. I think every man who fought for the preservation of this government should vote for these men. They are both strong union men; one is a soldier and the other a statesman, both well tried in their country's service. Harrison, I think, will be as strong as Blaine would have been. Of course, I would rather my brother John would have got it, but the Republican party should be the judge and select its own standard bearer. It is now the duty of every true citizen to stand by these men, who were true to the country when she was in danger. There has never been a true union man sent to represent this country in foreign lands under the present administration, and it is time for a change."

Short Talk to Workingmen.

The Democratic New York Sun says: Free trade means putting all the laboring men of the world upon one level of competition. Protection means restricting the competition among laborers to those living in our own country, and the consequence of such restriction is that wages remain at a high level; whereas, if the competition of all the laborers in the world were allowed to operate here, they would steadily fall to the lowest level. That is the reason why the workingmen of this country are better paid, are more prosperous, live in a better manner, are better educated, and bring up their children with more of hope and ambition than belongs to workingmen in any other country. This is why the workingmen of the United States like the American system of protection, and dislike the British system of free trade. [The Republican party is for protection: the Democratic for free trade.—Troy Times.]

The American Creed.

Condensed into the form of a short creed, the Republican platform is something like this:

We believe in a free ballot and in having every vote counted.

We believe in protection for protection's sake, and we are not ashamed of it.

We believe in abolishing internal taxes created for war purposes.

We believe in the direct protection of American labor against cheap foreign labor.

We believe in free internal competition.

We believe in railroad regulation.

We believe in homesteads and good homestead titles for citizens.

We believe in home rule for big and intelligent territories.

We believe in a double monetary standard.

We believe in the utmost facilities for education, as worth all they can cost.

We believe in a big merchant marine and in American ship-yards.

We believe in a good navy, good coast defenses and good water routes for commerce.

We believe in making other nations respect our rights and pay for all they get from us.

We believe in protecting American citizens against foreign interference, not only at home, but in any part of the world.

We believe in civil-service reform more than ever; and

We believe that nothing is too good for the soldiers who risked their lives to save the country and saved it.—New York Press.

The Democratic Fraud.

The democratic platform claims that the party has "reclaimed from corporations and syndicates" nearly 100,000,000 acres of the public domain. This is a most unblushing falsehood that might pass—if asserted by a cross-road politician or country newspaper—as the result of ignorance, but coming from a body of remarkably well-informed men, can be called nothing but what it is—a downright palpable, willful lie.

The platform "challenges the most searching scrutiny" of the acts of the administration, when every democratic senator voted against a resolution for an open debate on the fisheries treaty, one of the most important acts of the administration.

It says that democracy means an "indissoluble Union," when the Democrats who ruled the convention and the party were engaged four years in an attempt to destroy the Union.

The platform declares that the "rights and welfare of the people have been guarded and defended" * * "and the equality of all our citizens" without regard to race or color has been steadfastly maintained." And yet American fishermen have been deprived of liberty and property, and the American flag insulted and scarcely a remonstrance from the administration, and millions of American citizens have been denied every right, but that of existence, because of race and color."

But it is useless to enumerate further. The whole platform is a combination of falsehoods so brazenly impudent that it could only proceed from men utterly indifferent to public opinion or thoroughly imbued with the belief that the people of the country are fools.—Washington Republican.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

THE MINNESOTA THIRD.

D. S. Hace Nominated for Congress to Succeed J. S. MacDonald.

The Third Minnesota congressional district convention met in Red Wing to nominate a candidate for the seat in congress now filled by Judge MacDonald. Capt. A. H. Reed was the most prominent candidate, and he started in lacking only three votes of enough to nominate him, the first formal ballot standing as follows.

Reed	29	Strobeck	2
Strait	18
Hall	14	Total	63

The Hall men had much in their favor. Goodhue was not at all satisfied Reed could be elected if nominated, and Marcus Johnson was positive Hall could. So Johnson corralled a couple of votes from Kandyohi and Chandler and Wilson gathered Goodhue into the fold, while Maj. Strait told Rice county and the rest of his friends Hall was very acceptable as far as he was concerned. This fixed the matter and Reed fell victim to bad luck, to semi-lukewarmness on the part of three or four of his adherents and to the doubt in Goodhue whether he would succeed, coupled with the belief that he had not done his duty by Herbert two years ago, though Capt. Reed has denied the latter assertion many times.

On the second attempt the ballot was thus announced:

Reed 27, Strobeck 2, Hall 34. Total 63.

There was a good deal of cheering when Mr. Hall was announced as the nominee.

The following resolutions were adopted.

Resolved, That we endorse the nominations of the late Republican convention for president and Vice-President and pledge to the ticket our hearty support.

Resolved, That we endorse with hearty approval the platform of the late Republican national convention.

Resolved, That while supporting the doctrine of protection to American industries, American labor, American homes, American fisheries and American honor, we demand a reduction of taxation to the requirements of the government, a judicious revision of the tariff by such reduction or repeal of duties as will relieve from unnecessary burdens the necessaries of life and those articles other than luxuries which do not enter into competition with the products of American labor.

These resolutions were signed by nine members of the committee. The other two members brought in a minority report as follows, but was rejected:

Resolved, That the expression in the majority report, "We demand a reduction of taxation to the requirements of the government," be struck out.

Call for Democratic Convention.

All Democrats and other voters of the State of Minnesota who favor a reduction of the present exorbitant tariff and excessive taxation are invited to unite in sending delegates to a state convention to be held in the city of St. Paul on Wednesday, Aug. 15, 1888, at 11 o'clock, a. m., for the purpose of nominating the following state officers, viz.: Governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, state treasurer, attorney general, chief justice of the supreme court, associate justice of the supreme court and seven presidential electors. The basis of representation in said convention is one delegate for each county of the state and one delegate for each 250 votes or major fraction thereof cast for President Cleveland in 1884. The several counties of the state, upon this basis, will be entitled to representation to said state convention as follows:

The meteoric stone which recently fell on the premises of Mr. A. W. Sias in Rochester, is attracting considerable attention. The stone weighs 293 pounds, the surface is smooth and covered with a black crust like varnish. It is very heavy, and the metal is different from anything ever found around here. It is composed principally of iron. It fell in a bed of sand stone, into which it was imbedded about 18 inches.

The idea of establishing an insurance feature in connection with the state militia has been discussed by the regimental officers and it is strong enough to warrant the prediction that if submitted to a vote of the companies it would become a fixed fact.

How to treat promptly the poisonous Bites of Snakes, Insects, Dogs or Cats.

From the New York Sun.

Dr. Dunning's patient, William Gore, the New Jersey stonecutter, whose case has been attracting so much attention, was discharged from the hospital recently entirely cured. His recovery is remarkable, and reflects credit on the house surgeon in charge of the Manhattan Hospitable. On May 13 the young man was walking near a lake, and seeing a rattlesnake beside the path he put his foot upon it and reached down to seize it by the the tail, intending to swing its head against the rocks. As he did so another snake, concealed in the grass, fastened its fangs in his hand between the middle and index fingers. The young man consulted a physician, who recommended the use of aqua ammonia, and later, when the pain became intense, chloroform was applied for relief. On the following day the arm became swollen to twice its natural size, very much inflamed, and exceedingly painful. At this time he presented himsel at the hospital and submitted himself to Dr. Dunning's treatment, which consisted in making an incision in the wound, allowing it to bleed freely, and removing the part touched by the snake's fangs. To quote the doctor's words: "I next proceeded to get the young man gloriously drunk, and to keep him so for several days. At first it required considerable whisky to produce the required intoxication, but later a smaller amount was sufficient. At the same time carbonate of Ammonia was constantly used to accelerate the action of the heart and counteract the effects of the poison. For some time after the man entered the hospital the arm continued to swell, the severe pains extending to the shoulder, head, and finally to the other arm, being most persistent and obstinate in the ears, and continuing there even after the wounded arm was free from pain, and a peculiar diffusive redness extended itself over the entire body, so marked that when a finger was drawn with slight pressure over the surface of the skin a white line was visible for a little time, and the wounded arm was very much inflamed. The patient remained in the hospital ten days before being discharged."

"What is the proper treatment for a snake bite?"

"The wound should be opened with a knife, a ligature bound tight about the limb wounded, between the wound and the body, and the blood from the cut be allowed to flow freely. The ligature, if very tight, should not remain on more than two or three hours, lest the death of the member follow from lack of circulation. The wound should then be cauterized with a red-hot iron or nitrate of silver, and treated with a carbolic dressing containing one part carbolic acid to sixty parts water. If very severe, a charcoal poultice, composed of powdered charcoal alone, combined with flaxseed, should be bound on the wound. This treatment may be applied without calling a surgeon, if much time must elapse before the arrival of the surgeon, and if promptly and thoroughly done is very efficacious in saving time. There are no wounds so virulent and fatal as those caused by snake bites, for in their fangs is secreted an extremely poisonous substance, which is deposited in the wound through little grooves in the fangs. The fangs are jointed, and fall back into the mouth when the animal is feeding, being used only as a means of defense when attacked. There are far more deaths from snake bites than from wounds given by dogs. If a dog is known to have hydrophobia, the person bitten by him should apply much the same treatment as in the case of snake bite—cauterizing the wound and applying the poultice of charcoal. Cats sometimes make ugly wounds, not from any inherent poison in themselves, but from venomous substances on their teeth deposited there by some food they have eaten or decayed meat. The virulence by these wounds is usually destroyed by an application of aqua ammonia, commonly called hartshorn, and a poultice of flaxseed. No more efficacious remedy is known for the stings of insects, spiders, mosquites, etc., than ammonia or a poultice of common salt. If the sting is from a hornet, wasp, or bee, the salt poultice should be moistened with vinegar, and will relieve the pain almost instantly."

The Psalm in History.

From the Christian Age.

The Huguenots, before the battle of Contras, knelt and chanted the 118th Psalm, "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; because His mercy endureth forever." Seeing their attitude of supplication some courtiers cried: "Behold, the cowards are already begging mercy!" "No," answered an old officer who knew their way, "you may expect a stern fight from the men who sing songs and pray."

After the victory of Dunbar, Cromwell and his army sang the 117th Psalm, "Oh, praise the Lord, all ye nations; praise Him all ye people." No one knows what a great part the Psalms have played in the lives of men. These poems, which reflect every praiseworthy human emotion, have associated themselves, like the rain and sunlight, with all sorts and conditions of men, women and children. The penitential groanings of the 6th Psalm, "Oh, Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger," have been sobbed out by Catherine de Medici, John Calvin and Mrs. Carlyle. It might properly be called the "Universal Psalm of the Penitent."

When the eloquent erratic Edward Irving was dying he gathered up his strength and chanted in Hebrew the 23rd Psalm, the Shepherd's song. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil," whispered Scotland's greatest metaphysician, Sir Wm. Hamilton, and then breathed out his spirit. The parting word of Luther, of Knox, of John Huss, of Jerome, of Prague, and of countless martyrs and saints was the fifth verse of the 31st Psalm. "Into Thine hand I commit my spirit." The northernmost grave on the face of the earth is near Cape Beechy, on the brow of a hill covered with snow. In it is buried the body of a member of the Nares expedition. A large stone covers the dead; and on a copper tablet at the head is engraved a part of the seventh verse of the 51st psalm, "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow."

Her Terrible Sufferings.

Mrs. Elizabeth Burridge Bullock, daughter of Benjamin Burridge, writes a Lockport, N. Y., correspondent, who died recently, was a sufferer from a strange ailment. She was, so to speak, in an almost complete state of ossification for the past five years, and her joints had become stiffened so that it was impossible for her to live. She was a most intense sufferer from the pain attended upon the advances of the disease. The contracting and drawing of the bones and cords of the body was agonizing. The lady was 36 years old at the time of her death. When 13 years of age she was a plump girl, attendant on school. One day, with other playmates, she climbed a tree in the neighborhood of the school, and was dared to jump from one of the branches.

This she did, breaking her collar bone and injuring her right knee. A swelling appeared on the inside of the knee, which troubled her more or less as the years advanced. In 1873 medical aid was first called in to treat her knee, the pain from which had grown to be quite severe, she having caught cold in the member while skating. She married in 1874. Some years later her bones began to stiffen and trouble her some. Five years ago the joints became hardened and ossified and she was helpless. Her teeth were all drawn out from the upper jaw and both jaws set. Physicians inserted a piece of thin wood between the lower set of teeth and the gums to keep the teeth from injuring them. It was about three months after the first appearance of the rigidity of the bones before the body was completely affected. Her health was completely undermined, and the five years she has been failing from day to day. The effect can be realized when from a strong, healthful woman, weighing 108 pounds, she faded away to almost a mere skeleton, weighing only 30 pound when she died.

George Long shot and killed Henry Baker on the farm of the latter near Indianapolis. Long, who is a young man with a rather bad reputation, had been courting Baker's daughter for several years, the old man vehemently opposing the friendship. Baker caught the two out together and attempted to kill Long. He shot him in the side and back, when Long got the revolver away from Baker and killed him.

A BABY IN A WELL.

Thrilling Rescue of a Child From a Well Seventy Feet Deep.

A farmer named Detwiler, who lives three miles from Oakdale, Neb., had occasion to draw out the wooden tubing from a deep-bored well on his place, and had drawn out seventy feet of it, leaving an unknown number of feet of tubing in the well. This left a hole about a foot in diameter. A 3-year-old boy of the family was missed, and a search being made for him his hat was found near the hole. The mother called down and her child, from an immense depth, finally replied. Appeals for help were at once sent to Oakdale and Neligh, and though all possible haste was made, all the appliances for sinking a shaft down alongside the bored hole could not be got into the ground and the work of digging begun late in the afternoon of Saturday. Stenson & Stratton, well borers and diggers from Oakdale, and a firm in the the same line of business from Neligh undertook the job, and there was no lack of helping hands. But, as the supply of air down in this deep, narrow hole might be insufficient to help the child, an iron tube was sunk down and a hand bellows inserted, through which fresh air was constantly pumped down during the forty hours while digging was going on.

From time to time the child's cries could be heard and often during Saturday afternoon it called for "mamma," and for food and water. The process of digging went slowly during Saturday night on account of lack of light, and rapid diggers had at times to give place to slow workers. All this time the father and mother were enduring untold torture of mind; the former sometimes raving, and gray hairs almost momentarily increasing on the heads of the distracted parents. About 3 o'clock the child seemed to lose all patience, and filled his narrow circular tomb with his loud crying. It was a hard matter for strong men to endure the extremely distressing condition of affairs with anything like composure. All the time, day and night, crowds of men, women and children were standing around with faces white with horror, the hearts of the men digging in the shaft, and those on the windlas on top were bleeding at the cries of the helpless babe below. During all of Saturday and Sunday night, perhaps half the people who knew of the affair slept little or none.

On Saturday an unfortunate experiment was made in the way of grappling for the child with a wormer. It is supposed that the wormer caught into the tubing below and raised it a little when its hold released, and something was heard to drop. Then there was a new distress in the minds of the waiting crowd lest the wormer had caught into and lacerated the flesh of the child or had inflicted bruises on it for its voice thereafter was less often heard, and much weaker. As the diggers down in the shaft went deeper, they heard the child moaning in pain.

By Sunday noon they had dug to a depth of about fifty feet, and the child yet twenty-two feet at least below them. By nightfall the work was necessarily going on slower, for more time was being consumed in hauling up the dirt. Besides, the most delicate and dangerous part of the job was now at hand, and Will Stenson and James Strallen, of Oakdale, both experienced men in underground operations were sent down; and they remained there from 11 o'clock Sunday night till 9 o'clock Monday morning, when the awful scene was ended. Stenson, as a miner and well-digger, had many narrow escapes during his life-time, and as he was now down sixty-five feet in a partially dry shaft, with treacherous walls of earth above and around him, his situation was very perilous, for no time could be spared to construct and sink wooden curbing in the shaft. Soon after Stenson and Strallen went down into the shaft at 11 o'clock Sunday night, they struck loose sand and gravel. A few of the impatient crowd above urged Stenson to dig on through the gravel the remaining seven feet supposed to be intervening between him and the child, but he withstood them and began to tunnel in toward the circular hole right on top of this gravel bed, so he could have a firm clay roof to his tunnel.

He was then about eight feet to one side of the circular hole. He tunneled in a few feet and then dug another shaft, closer to the circular hole, down to where he thought the child might be lodged. His object was to strike a spot underneath the spot where the child was lodged for it would have been fatal to have disturbed the earth wall of the circular hole above the child. Finally he tunneled toward the circular, and tapping it, was suprised to find himself yet above the child. He was able then to reach down and tie a rope around the foot of the child and by the same device hold him secure there, but he dared not yet risk an attempt to draw him up for fear he might break down the crumbling walls of the hole and of the tunnel and thus bury both himself and the child alive. So he sank another and second small shaft down a few feet yet further until he knew he was below the child Under these circumstances the work had to be very slow. Stinson worked like a mole with trenches of sand all around him, passing dirt out by handfuls to Strallen in the first small shaft, and Strallen doing the same to Sheriff Elwood, who was out in the main shaft.

All this time Stinson burrowing and literally working like a mole, through so treacherous an element, could hear the child moaning faintly. Whenever a loose board rattled overhead he could feel the shock, and he did not know but that the walls of the shaft were coming upon him, and whenever the furious wind, which was then (on Monday morning) raging over the earth's surface, rattled down loose earth and pebbles on top of the child, it seemed to feel it. Indeed the child seemed to be as sensitive to the least jar as Stinson was, for it would moan the stronger and more piteously. The three men, unnerved by the horror of their situation, working and wept, and the sun rose yet on Monday morning with these men handing out dirt by handfuls—practically earned ashes, and with no hand but that of God to trust to, ever bring them and the child to the earth's surface again. Finally, by the most delicate manipulations, Stinson was at last able to grasp the child, and let himself and his precious burden into the main shaft.

At 9:20 Monday morning, after the child had been in the well forty-eight hours about, Stinson was hauled up to the top of the shaft with the child in his arms. A hasty examination of the child was made, when it was found not only to be alive, but bright of eye and conscious, though very weak. Apparently it had slid down the circular hole slowly, rump first, but was found with its rump wedged into the top of the circular tubing set into the hole, its feet a little above its head, and its hands some six or eight inches above its head.

When the child was brought to the surface the scene was indescribable. Stinson staggered unnerved and exhausted, but very many of the two hundred people there sunk to the ground prostrated by emotion. There were no noisy demonstrations; the hearts of the crowd of lookers-on were too full for utterance.

Although all the parties who helped so faithfully are worthy of unstinted praise, yet under the circumstances, it is natural that Stinson especially and his partners in the depth of what might have been their tomb, should now be the heroes of the hour. While Stinson is lying at his home exhausted, his fellow citizens are contributing to a fund for a testimonial to be given to him.—Omaha Herald.

Settling With Obnoxious Men.

In one of the Albany breweries during the recent labor troubles was a very objectionable employe. The firm had endeavored in every way to rid itself of him without effect, because of the agreement with the knights. At last the head of the firm proposed to the man that it would pay him $12 a week for a year if he would keep away from the brewery, but the organization he belonged to would not allow such a thing. When the agreement expired the man was almost immediately discharged, and this precipitated the long fight which followed between brewers and men. Another novel case was that of an employe of a local shoe factory. He was obnoxious and the firm discharged him. A committee of the labor assembly of which he was a member waited on the firm and demanded that the man be put at work again. The committee was taken aback by the quick response: "All right; send him back in the morning." The old employe went to the shop as usual and was told to take a certain chair in the office. He went to dinner and returned, and was bidden to resume his seat. The next day he wriggled through the weary hours in the chair. The third morning he asked if he wasn't to be placed at work. "Aren't you working?" asked one of the firm. "We employed you to sit in that chair." It is sufficient to say that the man did not return to work next week, and having discharged himself the knights could not find fault with the firm.—Albany Journal.

Could Handle Criminals.

From the New York Tribune.

The late Amos Pilsbury, under whose administration the Albany penitentiary gained the reputation of being one of the best managed penal institutions in the country, was a man who seemed not to know what fear was. Mr. Pilsbury was chatting one evening at a social gathering with a number of persons, including a captain of the Albany police. During the conversation the captain quietly remarked: "Mr. Pilsbury, I see that Bill—is dead"—mentioning the name of a well-known member of the criminal class. "Yes," replied Pilsbury, "I read the notice of his death and it brought to mind a rather interesting experience that I once had with him." This remark aroused the curiosity of his companions, and at their solicitation Mr. Pilsbury related the experience. "A good many years ago, before I had seen much service as a prison manager, this Bill —— was sentenced to the Albany penitentiary. He arrived, ugly lips compressed, eyes flashing a baleful fire. Bill resolutely declined to have his hair cut. You know we always cut a prisoner's hair as soon as he reaches us. Well, I informed him—and I guess my voice sounded pretty decided—that he must submit to the rules of the institution or take the consequences. He answered that he'd be d—d if he'd have his hair cut. Consequently I ordered him put into one of the dark cells or placed on starvation diet, I forget just what, until he should surrender. It was not long before he sent for me and stated that he'd made up his mind to submit. Accordingly I had him placed in the barber's hands. No sooner, however, was he shorn of his hair than he turned to me with as murderous an expression as I ever saw a human face and burst out, his voice trembling with passion: "You want to look after me, Amos Pilsbury. If ever I get a chance at you, you're a dead man." "Well, not long after the regular barber of the penitentiary fell ill and, on learning that Bill had once kept a 'tonsorial parlor,' I decided that he should take the place of the sick man. Then there was trouble again. I found that his appointment was giving great dissatisfaction. Why? Well, one or two of the men remarked in Bill's presence that they were afraid to allow such a desperado to run a razor over their faces. That put me on my mettle. I was young, and my temper was not so cool as it is now; so I exclaimed: 'Afraid! Nonsense—why should you be afraid? I believe that Bill's as trustworthy a barber as we ever had in the institution.' With that I got into the barber's chair—throat were bared. The act was, of course a foolhardy one. I was risking my own life and exposing a bloodthirsty convict to a terrible temptation. However, I never had a better shave in my life, although the barber's hand trembled so that I was afraid he would accidentally cut me, even if he didn't intentionally carve me up. When he got through I shook hands with him, and from that day until his term expired he was one of the most exemplary prisoners in the institution. One day after his term expired, he related the incident of shaving me. 'Why Bill, didn't you go to Pilsbury?' inquired the rough to whom he was talking. 'Lacked sand, eh?' 'No,' replied Bill, 'I didn't lack sand. But d—n me if I could do him up. He showed his confidence in me; he put himself completely in my power. No, I couldn't kill as game a man as Pilsbury showed himself.'"

Flimsy Underwear.

New York Mail and Express.

"Bad cold?"

"I should say I had, doctor," responded the reporter as he smothered a cough.

"What kind of underclothing do you wear?"

"The same kind I wore all summer."

"Linen or cotton!"

"I really can't say. Cotton I believe."

"Did you suffer much from the heat during the summer?"

"Suffer! I should say I did. I nearly melted."

"And you are a trifle chilly now that the cold wave has come?"

"I am, indeed; but what has my underwear to do with that? I have always worn the same kind in the summer."

"So does almost every one. The use of linen and cotton for the underwear is one of the commonest of all errors in this country. Now in Germany we have a movement which is called the German School of Clothing Reform. It aims to replace cotton and linen with woolen goods. There are many reasons why this should be done. Wool exercises a stimulating effect upon the skin, unlike linen and cotton, and consequently produces the proper action of the pores, glands and superficial tissues. It is a nonconductor of heat and preserves the normal temperature of the body. It allows a freer escape of the perspiration, and thus lowers, by evaporation, any abnormal temperature of the body, and facilitates the loss of excessive heat. Also, through its nonconductivity of heat, it preserves the normal measure of warmth. Hence it is a better protection against the extremes of either heat or cold than linen or cotton."

"Well, those certainly do seem to be reasons enough."

"Indeed they are, but they are not all. Wool is electrical, while linen and cotton are not. Wool can excite electricity, but does not conduct it. Therefore a body clothed in wool loses less of its animal electricity is excited on the surface. The intimate relationship between galvanic, nervous and vital forces render this peculiarity of the greatest importance to the wearer."

"Why doesn't every one wear wool then?"

"Because," answered the physician, "the old idea of having something flimsy and gauzy next to the flesh is too firmly instilled in the minds of the manufacturers of underwear for them to experiment with woolen materials. I have cured a large number of sick men of seemingly incurable disorders by simply prescribing a change in their underwear. While it is not an infallible cure-all," added the physician in conclusion, "it certainly is of much benefit, and its general adoption would result in great permanent good."

In a letter to Senator Mitchell of Oregon Assistant Secretary Maynard states: The present instructions of the treasury department regarding the killing of fur seals in Behring sea by the crews either of American or foreign vessels are the same as were in force during the past seasons, and that any such vessels found engaged in taking and killing seals in such waters will be liable to seizure.

Things People Should Know.

From the New York Graphic.

Mr. A. S. Murray, keeper of Greek and Roman antiquities, British Museum, delivered an interesting lecture at the Parkes Museum on Thursday, March 22, on the "Physical Training of the Greeks and Romans." He observed that it had been said in ancient times that the two things which the Greeks desired most were to be healthy and to be beautiful. Beauty, in their eyes, was attainable largely by a careful system of physical training. We see, he observes, their idea of physical beauty nowhere better than on the sculptured frieze of the Parthenon at Athens now in the British Museum, for the greater part of it is a simple glorification of youth as developed by physical training on horseback and in chariot racing. There was no more marked difference between the Greeks and semi-barbarous races that surrounded them than in this matter of physical training. In one of his dialogues Lucian introduces the Scythian prince, Anacharsis, who visited Athens in the sixth century B. C., and in the course of his visit went to the Palaistra. He was much surprised at the various exercises of the youth, thinking them ridiculous. He asked Solon, the legislator, how he could defend such folly. Solon explained that the exercises of the youth might seem absurd to an onlooker, but that they were meant to train up a race of men who, largely by this training, should become valuable citizens, capable of taking their part in war through the skill of body they thus acquired, and capable of taking a share in the administration of public affairs through the clearness of head and ready judgment which the habitual training of the palaistra fostered in them. The lecturer then proceeded to describe the ordinary exercises of the boys previous to their reaching the age of joining the palaistra, giving instances of skill attained in the various contests of leaping, running, wrestling, boxing, throwing the disc and the spear. Lastly he noticed the the physical training of the girls, to whom running was the only form of public contest allowed, and that only in a very restricted degree.

Nature's Cosmetic.

No surer preventive of wrinkles or a worn-looking skin can be obtained than sleep at the proper times or at odd moments, but of course this does not apply to the sleep obtained by artificial means. Healthful and natural slumber is of all remedies for a skin prematurely old the best, and the society belle who has the good of her complexion at heart will contrive a regular rest daily—if possible at a stated hour. One of the most famous beauties of the day—the wife of a well-known artist and whose social life is not altogether one of inclination, since there are actual duties involved in it—told me that she made it a rule to sleep daily after her afternoon exercise from 6 to 7, arising refreshed and ready for the duties of the evening, while she was certain that the delicate texture of her skin had been preserved by this means. Certain it is that at forty years of age this woman has the peculiar bloom of a girl of twenty. "Beauty sleep" is only so called because among the women of the Orient the practice of early sleep at night was cultivated and in Paris there are few belles who do not take a siesta before attending a ball. Of course the busy housekeeper will smile at suggestions which her home and often her nursery make impossible, but I am inclined to think that with a little effort even such a one could contrive a brief period of rest which might recuperate not only the complexion but the spirits of the governing head of the house.—Philadelphia Times.

Moxie.

Old men use Moxie the year round to keep their nervous system strong enough to support the functions of their body, and mend up the break down of a long business life. The young city bloods to remove the effects from liquors and a night of dissipation. A tumbler full will break a recent intoxication in an hour, with no ill effects of stimulation.

It is proposed to remove Gen. Sheridan to Fortress Monroe at an early date.

No Cut Rates About This.—Only to answer the constant call for a good and low priced cough and croup remedy do we now introduce our Allen's Lung Balsam in three sizes, 25c., 50c., and $1.00 a bottle at all druggists.

The collections of internal revenue during the first 11 months of the fiscal year ending June 30, '88 amount to $114,094,759, being $5,428,867 more than the collections during the corresponding period of the last fiscal year. The aggregate receipts for May last were $275,529 greater than those for May 1887.

It is reported that ex-Mayor Grace and Daniel Lamont had purchased the New York Star.

The Common Lot.

There is a place no love can reach,
There is a time no voice can teach,
There is a chain no power can break,
There is a sleep no sound can wake.

Sooner or later that time will arrive, that place will wait for your coming, that chain must bind you in helpless death, that sleep must fall on your senses. But thousands every year go untimely to their fate, and thousands more lengthen out their days by heedful, timely care. For the failing strength, the weakening organs, the wasting blood, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a wonderful restorative and a prolonger of strength and life. It purifies the blood and invigorates the system, thereby fortifying it against disease. Of druggists.

The President has accepted the resignation of Lieut. Emery H. Taunt, of the navy, who was convicted by court martial in November of 1887, of absence from duty without leave, and of disobedience to orders and sentenced to dismissal. Subsequently two boards examined Lieut. Taunt as to his qualifications and his mental responsibility, and both decided that he was in good health and sane.

Hot Days

Have a weakening effect, causing loss of strength and a languor of mind as well as body. This condition permits the developement of affections and diseases otherwise inactive. In such cases the system readily rallies under the influence of Hood's Sarsaparilla, which purifies the blood, tones and strengthens the digestive organs, and infuses fresh life and energy. Try it this season.

"My wife and myself were both generally run down. Hood's Sarsaparilla brought us out of that tired feeling, and made us feel like young people again. It has done more for us than all other medicines together." Richard Hawkhurst, Amityville, Long Island, N. Y.

I am glad to use such a reliable article."

It is understood that the outraged American hen is "laying" for the egg trust.

Famous Women.

It is a significant fact that most of the women who have achieved fame in art, literature, or "affairs," have enjoyed vigorous health. This shows that the mind is never capable of the severe and continued application necessary to creative work, unless the body is at its best. The woman who aspires to fill an exalted place among her associates, must be free from nervous debility and female weaknesses. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription will banish these, and it is warranted to restore these functional harmonies which are indispensable to health. As a specific for all those chronic weaknesses and ailments peculiar to women, it is unequaled.

Great Little Men.

Some of the greatest men that ever lived were of small stature and insignificant appearance. The reader will readily recall many instances. Very small are Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, but they are far more effective than the huge, old-fashioned pills which are so difficult to swallow and so harsh in their action. The "Pellets are gentle and never cause constipation. For liver, stomach and bowel derangements they have no equal.

TIRED OUT.

"Just tired out," the neighbor said,
Turning from the squalid bed,
Where the weary woman lay,
Panting life's last hours away,
Save that sound of sobbing breath.
All was still as coming Death;
For the frightened children cowered
Where, with heavy brows that lowered,
'Neath the long enduring strain,
The mute husband bore his pain.

Just tired out—far down below
Waves were fretting on the flow;
And the full recurrent roar
Echoed upward from the shore;
Fainter grew the pulses' beat
As the worn hands plucked the sheet,
And the death-damps gathered, where
Ruffled all the tangled hair.
Said the watcher at her side,
"She is waiting for the tide."

When the waves had ebbed anew,
The tired life was over too;
Gone from want, and care and ill,
Very peacefully and still,
After all she bore and wept,
Hard-worked wife and mother slept;
Very fair she looked, and meek,
Long dark lashes swept her cheek,
Worn hands crossed upon her breast,
For the weary was at rest."

—All the Year Round.

HER ROMANCE.

She kept a small store on the corner of Third street, where the children stopped on their way to school and spent their pennies. They all called her aunt Lucy. She was creeping along among the seventies, when the church in Pennhollow, where she had attended for over fifty years, changed ministers. Wise old parson Graves slipped quietly away to his farm, and young Arthur Winn, fresh from the college, succeeded him. It was like putting a book in the place of a living oracle, but the people had all hopes that the book would some time bud and blossom, as did Aaron's rod.

Young Winn had learned, while among the hills where he studied sacred lore, not only the wisdom requisite to his profession, but a heart lesson, which was quite as much needed. And so he took Regina Ball to Pennhollow.

Regina had been my inseparable companion from the time of short frocks and pinafores; and Pennhollow, with its great churches, its new duties, and strange scenes, could not fill the void which each felt at separation. Scarcely was the new tent pitched ere beseeching letters began to pour in upon me to come to dear, lonely friend; come and pass the winter in Pennhollow.

I had never traveled many miles away from my own home, and this opening opportunity was quite attractive. I took counsel with my mother, and it was agreed, somewhat sadly, I remember, that the beseeching letters should have a favorable answer. The sadness inhered in the thought of leaving my dear parents quite alone through the dull and stormy months, while I had a gay time in the city. But were ever parents thoughtful of themselves under such circumstances? From the beginning of the world until now, the very word parent stands for self-sacrifice. A pity for the children who allow the sacrifice to assert itself perpetually, and without large returns.

And in going to Pennhollw I got acquainted with aunt Lucy and learned her romance. When I walked up the broad aisle with Regina, and entered the minister's pew, I was somewhat surprised to find it occupied. A little old lady, her round face framed in white cap frills, sat in the corner of the pew. Her dark eyes had a smiling twinkle, which certain permanent dimples intensified, making the wrinkled old face inviting and pleasant. She was very decorious all through the services, and instead of being hindered in our devotions by the proximity of a stranger, we were helped. A degree of spiritual exaltation possessed us quite beyond any previous experience. It may have been in part owing to the time-honored church, and the multitude of decorous worshipers; but when Regina and I talked the matter over, we quite agreed that our heavenly mood was largely due to aunt Lucy. If sunshine such as hers can glorify the face of age, there is something in religion which our young enthusiasm has no power, as yet, to fathom, we said; something which grows and deepens with the passing years.

I found that aunt Lucy always sat in the minister's pew. She seemed to belong to the church in a way which nobody else did. As I got acquainted with the people, meeting them at the sociables, and around their own tables—Pennhollow was a master place to ask the minister to tea, and of course I was always invited, too—I found they all claimed relationship with the little old lady in the minister's pew. They had persuaded her to give up her candy store on the corner of Third street, thinking she was too old to have so much care, and let the church take care of her.

They took a right gracious way to supply the income of the candy sales. It was agreed that she should go out to pass the day with one family, then with another, until she had made the circuit of the parish, then begin and go around again, and so on. As aunt Lucy had a nephew living on a farm near the sea, so that she could go to the sea-shore in the summer, she did not visit the same family oftener than once a year, unless it might have been the family of the minister. She could not wholly conform to the routine, but would go where she liked somewhat oftener. I remember she came for the first time to the house of the young minister on the Sunday after Thanksgiving. An immense turkey, which did not get roasted on the regular day, for the reason that the minister's family was invited out, came to its post of honor for aunt Lucy.

How eloquently she praised the captain who brought the turkey, and the captain's wife who sent the pies. It was a fashion they had in Pennhollow I suppose, to save the minister's wife the trouble of mixing the indigestible compound, and the minister's purse the unnecessary outlay. It was a real God-send to Regina to have the pies, for she did not know much about cooking, and I did not, either, so that we naturally confined ourselves to simple things which were easily made.

We learned a great deal about the people of the parish through aunt Lucy. There was one blessed trait in the old lady—she praised everybody. We quite concluded, before the Sunday visit ended, that the church of the Holy Cross in Pennhollow had somehow managed to gather the cream of the city. Certainly, if every other church was made up of such perfect people as the young minister had that day preached to, there was an anomalous population in the city—a race of angels scarcely lacking wings.

After aunt Lucy went away, I said to Regina:

"There is a romance connected with this suave woman, and I am going to fathom it. She's right handsome, and I'll warrant there's a lover somewhere in the beginning of this century or the close of the last."

"She will not tell you, if there is" said my friend.

"You notice how easily she talks; of course she will tell me."

"Yes; she talks easily of common things, the church and the sewing circle, but lovers of fifty years ago are not so easily brought to the light of day. She'll be a very sphinx if you try to extract the secret of her aged maidenhood."

I believed in myself rather than in Regina, on this especial theme, and as a phrenologist had just told me there were car-loads of paper waiting for my pen, naturally I wanted to take possession of interesting material. So I began to court aunt Lucy. There was ample opportunity. I met her twice in the church on Sunday, and as often on week days "out to tea," when it was very delightful to walk home with her, and sit a while in her cosey room on Antler street.

I asked her about the old times when the church was in its infancy, and about the people who filled its ample spaces before the great division which occurred during the war of 1812.

One night—I remember the dim candle light, and just how she looked plying her busy knitting needles—we had been to tea at Capt. Rice's, and she talked about sea captains a great deal on her way home; when, rising and going to the bureau, she fumbled among the papers and brought me a miniature of a "sea captain," she said. The very young face was genial and honest, and I asked her if he went to the old church.

"Yes; we went to the old church together, when we were children."

"That is a beautiful picture, aunt Lucy. Where was it painted?"

"In Paris," she replied, and her voice was low and tremulous.

"Tell me about him, aunt Lucy."

"Why, I have never told anybody about him."

"But you can tell me. I am soon going back to my home among the green country hills, and it will be just as safe with me as though it were locked up in a chest and the key lost."

"I don't know what made me show you the picture. I have never shown the picture to one of the girls. But I do feel just like talking about him tonight, and I guess I will. We went to Ma'am Goreham's school together when we were children; and he used to carry my books for me, and lead me, and I liked him better than any of the other boys and girls, and he liked me. Then when he was not a bit more than fifteen, he went to sea. I did not want him to go, but he would.

"He said he meant to be a rich sea captain and know all about the wonderful countries all over the world. He was gone six years, and when he came home, if he was not a captain, he was pretty near it. He came to see me the very first place he went, and brought me the miniature and these shells, and some other lovely things, too, which did not last like the shells. That was the time we were engaged. But I was too happy to tell of it, and not a soul ever knew.

"He went off again to be gone three years, and he expected to be captain before he came back, and then we were to be married, and I was to take one voyage with him, and if I liked it, I might go as often as I pleased. I thought I should live on the sea if he did. I was very busy, and the three years did not seem so long as I thought it would. But when it was all ended the captain did not come and the waiting was hard. By-and-by, the newspapers said that the vessel sailed for home at a given time, and ought to have reached port long before. But I did not give up. I kept on hoping and praying, and praying and hoping that my captain would yet come.

"My wedding dresses were all ready—I did not have them made in Pennhollow, for fear the people would find out, and I wanted to keep it all to myself. But the long days kept coming and going just the same; and every morning when I awoke my heart ached, and it did not get over aching all day. I used to go down to the shore and look out on the sea almost every day; but that only made me sadder. I was beginning to think that my captain was lost, and I grew very restless and thin and almost sick. Then one day Parson Richards comforted me, though he did not know it. He took for a text, "He holdeth the sea in the hollow of his hand;" and oh, he talked beautifully about the good, loving father who has so many doors into his heavenly kingdom, and after that, it did not seem so terrible to go by way of the sea. And even in thinking of the body of my captain being rocked in the sea, it was all right after I knew that God's arms was under the water. Then I said I must live, and as I was poor, with no friends to help me, I must work. So I set up the little candy store. I kept a variety of other articles which brought a great many people, and especially children, into my store every day. It was good for me, seeing them, for it helped me to keep a pleasant face, and after awhile, the sunshine got down into my heart. The old church helped me more than anything else, and the ministers' wives were always kind to me and wanted me to sit in their pew. He never came back, and we never heard from him or the vessel."

This, then, was aunt Lucy's romance; locked in her heart for fifty years; filling her life with a serene and gracious sweetness, broken at my feet at last like the alabaster box of precious ointment. Now I had a secret that even Regina could not know, that I would not have her know for the world. Was she not daily questioning me about a lover of mine who was a long way off, and whom she suspected of coldness? I could not let her know the tender bond holding me to aunt Lucy.

In my determination to hide my heart's unrest, I watched the postoffice, and when she questioned me about letters from him, I avoided a direct answer. Regina, in her young content—well, she wanted a great boon to come to all whom she loved. But that could hardly be possible. "Sir Arthur," as we liked to call him, was a princely man, and Regina had drawn a prize in life's lottery.

The winter days were at length counted out amid much going and coming and real earnest work in the home and church. A successful fair had marked the young minister's first winter, and we had made a multitude of acquaintances at the fair. When spring began to show its green I went back to my school teaching among the hills, and to the home that was glad of my coming. Several years went by before I again saw Regina. Indeed I did not expect to visit her again, so far away, but she expected it and said so. The second baby was a girl and named for me. It was to be christened in June, and beseeching letters began to pour in upon me again. I must come to the christening, come and pass the summer; I had kept school long enough to deserve a rest; and summer was the time to see Pennhollow in all its glory. As father and mother had grand-children growing up around them now, it was easier to say yes, and I went.

After the christening, there were plans which seemed to have been made especially for me; drives to the shore, and sails down the harbor, and a visit to aunt Lucy, whom I sadly missed in the minister's pew. She was spending the summer at her nephew's, close by the sea. Indeed, his farm took in the beach sands and pebbles, and the roar of the ocean was their perpetual music. I found aunt Lucy grown older, and seeming much feebler than when she told me her story in the low chamber on Antler street. But she brightened up wonderfully on seeing her visitors, and walked with us along the shore and clear out to "Spouting Horn," where she looked into the chasm and told stories of the height to which the water would spurt into the air during a troubled sea at high tide.

I grew quite nervous over the stories and the appearance of the rocky gorge, and needed to sit awhile on the sands and look over the limitless and peaceful blue to restore my usual equanimity. Aunt Lucy sat down with me, while Arthur and Regina, not yet over their lovers' ways' walked hither and thither, hand in hand, as happy as two children. While we looked out upon the sea, aunt Lucy said, gently, "I am going to see my captain soon."

"Do you feel more unwell than usual?" I asked.

"Not really sick, but weak and tired. I have not walked to 'Spouting Horn' before this summer. And it is time for me to go. I am more than eighty now."

"You will not be sorry, will you, aunt Lucy, when your captain calls?"

"Sorry! I shall be glad! gladder than I have been since he went away. I am fairly impatient to go. It seems to me the bridegroom is waiting for me, and I know how sad it is to wait. I want to save him that pain."

That was all. A little signal hung from the cottage window in token of the dinner hour, and we hurried up the sands. At sunset we drove home, all of us impressed that we had talked with aunt Lucy for the last time this side of the dividing flood.

A week later the bell on the church of the Holy Cross tolled. We listened to its vibrant notes, which, on the summer air, hardly seemed a knell. Then came the sexton along the hedgerow, and, scarcely pausing, he spoke through the open window. There were tears in his voice, and we only heard "aunt Lucy."

The smile and dimples which habit had fixed upon her face, remained to greet all who looked upon her in death. As she lay in peace before the altar, while the minister spoke her praises, which were in every heart, it seemed to me that she had enjoyed her wedlock in a higher and sweeter way then many real marriages are enjoyed.

It has been a tender dream, a gracious memory, and for many years—since she had learned to look forward and not backward—a beckoning hope; while through all the slow passages she had been, in deed and in truth, the bride of the church, guarded down to gentle rest by its blessed arms, and in assuring hope of its divine promises.

While the minister spoke of her awaiting welcome from the great captain of our salvation, I almost wish he had known her secret, for the heavenly thrill it would have given his own heart, and the opportunity it would have afforded to say that word so consoling when life's chain is broken—reunion. But no lack was felt in aunt Lucy's full world of bliss, that nobody on earth knew, except the visitor at the home of the minister, that she had lived her romance.—Christian Leader.

In the Empire Days.

Galignanis Messenger.

The old inhabitants of the colony in Paris remember when Mason was in charge of the Legislation in France, and it was during his time, perhaps, that Paris was most in vogue with his countrymen, and particularly with his countrywomen. Presentations at the Tuilleries were then sought after by the American women, and the Emperor was liberal as to the number. On one occasion the American Minister had as many as fifty of his countrywomen with him at the Tuilleries, forming a long line.

When Louis Napoleon, approached, Mr. Mason began by naming those who stood at the head of the column, to each of whom the Emperor bowed as her name was mentioned. Then the memory of the minister failed him and with a wave of her hand that took in the whole line, he said:

"The rest are all my countrywomen, your Majesty."

The impassive face of Louis Napoleon showed a scarcely visible smile as he bowed to the nodding heads and rustling robes, and the presentation was finished.

Death in Chewing Gum,

An Apothecary in San Francisco Examiner.

I have been tempted time and again to write to the Examiner an appeal for its vast influence to stop a great evil and warn the people of this city against allowing their children to indulge in the practice of swapping chewing gum. Diphtheria is on the increase, especially among children, and any physician will affirm what I say that there is no surer way of propagating the disease than the habit so common among children that I speak of. Parents should teach their children, and the Board of Education should instruct the teachers in the public schools to admonish the children daily upon the evil effects of it.

Just as the Northern Pacific train was leaving Alhambra Springs Station, twenty miles from Helena two shots were fired in a saloon near the track. The conductor jumped to the platform and saw one man lying dead on the ground and another running toward the train with hands on his abdomen exclaiming, "My God, I am shot." The conductor caught the man as he fell, and then a crowd started in pursuit of a man who was noticed running toward the hills. He was captured, put on the train and brought to Helena where he was lodged in jail. His name proved to be Walker, but beyond giving it he refuses to talk.

LOVE'S SECRET.

Each heart doth know its secret shrine,
Where sweet flowers bloom that give no sign
Of sun or dew; with sweet desire
The buds were stirred that glowed with fire
And thrilled with life, and so bloom came,
Hope-lit and glowing—like love's flame!

Fond hands will nourish these fair flowers
That grow to life in secret hours,
As in dark paths all travel-worn,
Where hearts grow faint with burdens borne,
And desolate, they glow and gleam,
Though sealed to shadows—like love's dream!

And so sweetheart, thy life to mine
Was sealed! my soul went forth to thine,
Like the flowers that bloom untaught,
When love had come to us unsought,
Alas, so late! and yet so long
Its music lingers—like love's song!

The flowers may pale with sweet desire,
And love may swoon of love's mad fire,
Yet as I lie, on thy breast,
My soul uplifted in love's rest,
I do not see the darker path
That each lone life of sorrow hath!
Complete with love, sweetheart, love's shrine
In secret glows!—love knows its sign!

INHERITING A WIFE.

"Goodby, Helen," said a young man, with a flash of anger on his handsome face as he turned from his uncle toward the pale girl standing in the window.

"Goodby, Frank," she said, listlessly, proffering him a slender white hand.

He took the hand and bending over, lightly touched her forehead with his lips.

She raised her head to address him with a forced effort, and he was gone.

"The young fool thinks he can defy me," said Mr. John Duncan, angrily, but with love and pity rising to his kindly gray eyes as he bent them upon Helen.

The latter was the rich old man's adopted daughter, and in her seemed centered all his happiness. She was his idol and he had planned to make her his heiress, or that she should share all he had of this world's goods with Frank Duncan, his nephew. But this latter contingency was to be that these young people should hav his fortune together only as man and wife.

Helen Morley had been an orphan ever since she could remember. She had endeared herself to old Mr. Duncan by her sweet, unselfish life and her devotion to him as her benefactor.

She and Frank had been thrown much together, as a matter of course, and old Mr. Duncan, as he looked at his favorite nephew's handsome, animated face, and then at Helen's sweet oval picture, framed by her mass of bright hair, when the two were together, declared to himself they had been made for each other, and that it was plainly the work of heaven that they should have been thrown accidentally in eachother's way.

But he had just now serious misgivings whether or not heaven ever had anything to do with such a young scapegrace as his nephew.

He had just received a a terribe shock and was stirred dy anger, disappointment and pity for his fair Helen.

Then too, he was placed in so delicate a position that he hardly knew what to say to her.

He had no assurance that Frank had ever spoken a word of love to this girl.

"But he can't defy with impunity," growled he irate uncle, as Helen had not replied to his first remark about the young gentleman in question. "I will not leave him a cent. I will make a new will. He shall be a beggar for all he'll get from me," concluded John Duncan, stamping his foot fiercely.

"Oh, father!" said Helen appealingly, "What has he done to anger you so?"

"Done!" shouted the old man, fairly exasperated by this question, forgetting at the moment that Helen did not share his news, and therefore indignant that she should not join with him in condemning the young man's heinous crime. "Done!" he repeated in rising tones of freshly kindled anger. "What has he done? Upset all my plans. Destroyed all my happiness. Tells me he's in love with that French girl Elise Courtois, and that his happiness, his very life, depends upon his marrying her. And he has the effrontery to ask my approval of such a ridiculous step."

"The old man paused only at sight of Helen, who had sunk, pale and trembling, upon a sofa. Her delicate fingers were interlaced and there was a look of such unutterable pain in her face that even Mr. Duncan's anger died before it.

Then with a sudden thought his anger rose again and he demanded:

"Has the villain deceived you, Helen? Tell me the truth. By Heaven, if he has, I'll"——

"Oh, no, no; he has never spoken to me of—of"—

"There, there, my dear, I only wished to know; I meant it all for your good," said Mr. Duncan tenderly.

Helen fled to her chamber to think and to recover, if possible, from the sudden blow she had received.

There had been no spoken words of love between them for the three years that Frank had been a constant visitor to his uncle's and yet she had thought—she had believed—yes, she had hoped, that the first love of her pure young heart had found a safe resting place, and that it was reciprocated by him, although as yet not proclaimed, for some good and sufficient reason on his part.

But it was all over now. Her eyes were opened to the mortifying truth. She cried from pure shame at first, then for disappointment. Her face was all aflame as she thought of the possibility of the knowledge on the part of others of her misplaced love. Then her cheeks and brow became deadly cold as she realized that her young hopes were all withered and dead.

When Mr. John Duncan saw the light had gone out from Helen's eyes his anger towards his nephew knew no bounds. He knew that Frank had gone from his presence with a fixed determination to win the girl, Elise Courtois, if possible, in spite of all opposition.

And he knew what he could not speak of to Helen, that she had loved his headstrong and misguided nephew.

The old man was closeted with his lawyer soon after this occurrence for several hours one day, and the result of this conference was a new will.

Three years are not much! A mere spot on the ages. A bagatelle of weeks and months frittered away in frivolity and trifling.

* * * * * * * *

Three years are an age! A heavy leaden period stamped upon a life into which are crowded so much of mental pain and anguish that the rest of that life ought to be sunshine and flowers to compensate for their misery.

The three years following the departure of Frank Duncan in disgrace from his uncle's home had been to Helen Morley joyless years of silent suffering, unshared by a sympathetic heart, unspoken to a pitying ear. She had suffered in silence, and had tried to walk her allotted path with outward composure. And old John Duncan, though he had been more tender and solicitous of her welfare than ever, saw that he could do but little to lighten her burden of sorrow.

But John Duncan had gone now. There was no longer even his loving care to shield Helen from her own misery.

It had been but a few weeks since the old man had blessed Helen with his dying breath and then passed away. She was sole possessor of his wealth. Frank Duncan had been summoned, but was somewhere abroad, pursuing his ignis fatuus in the shape of fortune and Elise Courtois. He had lost sight of the French girl with whom he had become infatuated about the time his uncle had dismissed him angrily from his house. Following up a clew he overtook her family in Paris.

It was a chance meeting on one of the gay streets of the French city. The young man was wild with joy as he espied her coming toward him. He rushed upon her with far more of enthusiasm than discretion.

Elise drew back in surprise at his effusive greeting.

"Have you forgotten all the past, then, Elsie?" asked Frank bitterly, as he saw by her cool demeanor that she had changed.

"Oh! no, I never forget," said Elise.

"Did not you get my letter at the time I left my uncle?" said Frank, reproachfully.

"Oh, yes, I received your letter, and one from your uncle adout the same time, in which he informed me that you were no longer his heir, but a—a—beggar," said the young woman, laughing aloud.

"Good heavens! Elise, can it be that you are mercenary, then? I did not think"—

"No, I suppose you thought I could marry a—beggar just as well as not, and continue to work at millinery for my living and for yours, too, perhaps?" said the girl lightly.

"Elise, hear me. It is not to late. My uncle has not cut me off in his will. Will you not return with me, and for the sake of the past let me call you my own Elise—my wife?"

"Hush!" said the girl warningly, as a man approached. "I could do nothing of the kind. Let me present you to my husband, Monsieur Fennel."

And to his intense disgust and mortification Frank found himself the next instant in the embrace of a vivacious and voluble Frenchman.

The new view of the lovely siren in her courseness and her mammon worship, together with this presentation of a heavy, vulgar man past middle-age as her husband, was a combination of circumstances that completely disenamored Frank Duncan, and he fled precipitately as soon as released from the man's clutches, amid peal of laughter from the giddy French girl and guttural adieus from her male companion.

Old Mr. Somers sat in his dingy little law office, scratching his ear with his pen and glancing occasionally at a letter he held in his hand. The letter was from Frank Duncan, and informed the lawyer that he, Frank Duncan, would call upon him in a day or two on business relating to his deceased uncle's will.

"The young scamp must know now that Helen is the possessor of the old man's estate. He will be courting her for her money, and he doesn't deserve such a girl any way," said Somers with a growl. "And worse than all, to think John Duncan has fixed it in such a shape—but I'll deceive him a little."

The gruff old lawyer had in a sense taken Helen under his care since Mr. John Duncan's death, and watched her welfare with a jealous eye; so when Frank presented himself, he said brusquely:

"You are cut off without a cent, young man and you deserve it."

Frank colored, but felt the justice of the rebuke; but he ventured:

"And Helen—Miss Morley?"

"Oh, she is provided with a moderate annuity. The rest goes, I believe, to some institution—ahem, "said the lawyer choking a little at the lie.

"Thank God!" said Frank impulsively.

The old lawyer sprang to his feet in a passion, and facing the astonished young fellow shouted. "You thank God, then, that she is a beggar, too, do you?"

"I am glad that I may go to her and comfort her and be to her what I once was, without a suspicion that I came from mercenary motives," said Frank exultantly.

"Ahem!" That's all right, young man, but you must be aware that your past conduct doesn't recommend you very highly. I speak plainly for Helen Morely is my ward."

Frank winced under this lash, but all the same he was resolved to bear it in silence, and the scales had fallen from his eyes now, and he remembered trifling incidents in their lives—Helen's and his own—which led him to believe that he had thrown away a pearl. He would seek to recover it again, and was glad that the impediment of money did not bar the way. He knew full well, that his foolish infatuation for the gay superficial Elise, which he had mistaken for love, would prove a formidable obstacle; but with youth, repentance, perseverence, and an earnest devotion to his purpose he hoped to win Helen's esteem first, and afterward, perhaps her love.

And so Helen thought when the old lawyer told her about it and made her understand how difficult it would be to keep Frank long in ignorance of the provisions of his uncle's will.

Three months are brief measure of time as the ages roll onward, and yet three short months are sometimes so crowded with events bearing directly upon our lives that years, aye an age, are as nothing in comparison.

Three months of penitence, of unobtrusive devotion to Helen, of evident shame for his past conduct and an unmistakable determination to atone for it if possible, on the part of Frank Duncan, won the callous old lawyer to believe in his sincerity.

And, better than all, it began to tell upon the hard wall of reserve that had grown up between Helen's unquenched love and her pride till it finally crumbled away.

"You forgive me at last, Helen, but I can never forgive myself for being so stupidly blind as for having caused you years of pain besides," said Frank, tenderly.

"Let the dead bury their dead, Frank; but let us who now live again live only in the present, and hope for compensation for our past sorrows in the future."

"And I thank God that I did not have to woo you as an heiress. I will work for you and we will be happy.

Helen colored and was silent for a moment. Steps were heard in the hall and Mr. Somers was announced.

"Cut off without a cent and yet happy, apparently, said the lawyer brusquely, taking out a legal document and reading: "And if Frank Duncan forsake his foolish object and marry my adopted daughter Helen Morley, within three years and six months from the date of this testament, I do bequeath to him, etc."

"Better than you deserved, young man."

Helen blushed as Frank caught her in his arms.—New York Mercury.

A Passage Worth Preserving.

The world is always grateful to a stout-hearted and lofty-minded man or woman who makes an unusually good case against the terrors of death. Especially is this true when the plea for peace and happiness beyond the grave is put upon broad grounds that appeal to every fine soul's instinctive sympathies. And when such a declaration of faith is made by a man revered for his unquestioned genius and loved by a multitude of admirers, the good gift made to the world is all the better and more highly prized.

In a letter published in the October number of Scribner's Magazine, for the first time, Thackeray performs his great service to his fellow-men. The beauty and power of a passage relating to death mark it as one of the finest flashes of his genius and a gem well worth preserving. We reproduce it herewith:

"I don't pity anybody who leaves the world, not even a fair young girl in her prime; I pity those remaining. On her journey, if it pleases God to send her, depend on it, there's no cause for grief, that's but an earthly condition. Out of our stormy life, and brought nearer the divine light and warmth, there must be a serene climate. Can't you fancy sailing into the calm? Would you care about going on the voyage, but for the dear souls left on the other shore? but we shan't be parted from them, no doubt, though they are from us. Add a little more intelligence to that which we possess even as we are, and why shouldn't we be with our friends though ever so far off? * * * Why presently, the body removed, shouldn't we personally be anywhere at will—properties of creation, like the electric something (spark is it?) that thrills all round the globe simultanously? and if round the globe why not Ueberall? and the body being removed or elsewhere disposed of and developed, sorrow and its opposite, crime and the reverse, ease and disease, desire and dislike, etc., go along with the body—a lucid intelligence remains, a preception ubiquitous."

The stub train on the Omaha road coming down from Merriam Junction killed the Widow Dohl's deaf and dumb boy, about eight years old. There is a double track in front of her house, and some empty cars were standing there. The boy was running around the end of this train of cars to the main track so as to get to his home. He was thrown underneath the train and mangled into a shapeless mass, dying instantly.

The emperor and empress of Germany made their formal entry into Berlin. They came from Pottsdam to Charlottenberg by steamer. They were then driven to Berlin palace, escorted by a squadron of cavalry. Unter den Linden was crowded, and the royal couple were given a hearty reception.

THE OPERA AT SCUDDY

BY TOM P. MORGAN.

Omaha World.

The little town of Scuddy, away out on the Kansas border, on the proposed line of the D. K. & N. railway, was enjoying a boom of no mean proportions. Strangers were arriving daily, improvements were going on on every hand, and the little trading post was fast taking upon itself metropolitan airs.

Its citizens were jealously proud of its advancement, and the personal safety of a man who would have dared to assert that the town was not booming would have been very liable to be endangered.

Badgerton was Scuddy's only rival, the only thorn in the side of its citizens. Badgerton did not exist except upon the map, they scornfully asserted, but for all that it occasionally made its presence felt.

The Scuddyites hailed with delight any opportunity to gain advantage over Badgerton, and were feverishly to secure anything that would boom Scuddy on toward prominence and discomfit its rival.

It was this spirit that caused Jack Bates to prevail upon the Acme Opera company to visit Scuddy. Jack had seen this company at one of the towns further east, and had learned that they intended to visit Badgerton and not Scuddy.

It was not much in the way of an opera company, and Jack did not admire operas anyhow. But, as he expressed it "he didn't keer two whoops in Halifax for operys, nohow; he was plumb alive to the interests of Scuddy, and didn't propose that no one hoss place like Badgerton should git the bulge on her."

To have it said that the opera company had visited Scuddy and had scorned to appear at its rival, would be a cause for the most profound satisfaction to every resident of the latter place.

By guaranteeing that very place of business would be closed upon the night of the performance, and that every person in town and from as far as the Yellowhammer ranch should attend, at a $1 per head, or if unable to be present, should send the dollar, anyhow. Jack was able to secure the company. In return the manager signed a contract to the effect that he would not visit Badgerton under any circumstances. If asked his reason he promised to reply that the place was not of sufficient importance to warrant it.

Great was the rejoicing at Scuddy when Jack Bates announced the good news. A mass meeting was held, and Jack's acumen and fostering care for Scuddy's prosperity were landed to the skies. His name was even mentioned as that of a candidate for the mayorship at the next election.

When the stage drew up to the combined hotel and postoffice, a few days later, with a more elaborate flourish thad usual, it seemed as if every person in the little settlement was there to welcome its arrival. Bill Hankley, the driver, seemed to have acquired a new and added dignity since the citizens had seen him last.

"Air they thar?" asked Jack Bates anxiously.

"You bet?" was driver Bill's reply. A shout of welcome went up from the crowd as the door of the stage opened and the singers alighted. Old Colonel Darby, whose enthusiasm had got the better of his judgment, insisted upon delivering an address of welcome.

The last to leave the coach was a small, pale faced, yellow haired man, who bore in his arms a little bundle. It might have been a roll of clothing or it might have been a baby.

The yellow haired man was assigned a little room in the "L" of the hotel, on the first floor. He placed the bundle on the bed, and, softly removing the wrappings, revealed a baby, uneasily sleeping and catching its breath by fitful gasps. Its little face was thin and burning with fever. It opened its blue eyes and stretched its tiny hands feebly toward the yellow haired man. "I 'ant a d'nk, papa," the parched lips piped weakly.

All day long the yellow haired man sat beside the fever strickened baby. Oftimes his head sank on his breast, as if from sheer weariness, but he was always ready to instantly attend to the feeble cry of, "'ant a d'nk, papa," oft repeated.

The child seemed to be sinking rapidly. Its hot breath came and went in painful fluttering gasps.

Often the yellow haired man's eyes closed involuntarily, but the baby's feeble wail for water aroused him.

He took the little sufferer in his arms, and, as the sun sank from sight behind the distant mound, he seated himself before the open window.

The soft, southwestern breeze, ladened with the perfume of the wild verbenas, gently agitated the interlaced morning glory vines that crossed the window.

It dallied about the little hot face, fanned the burning cheeks and kissed the small parched lips. It toyed with the baby's yellow curls, so like those of the pale faced man who bent above it.

The little head nestled closer to the man's heart.

"Sing, papa," the parched lips whispered..

It was only an old fashioned lullaby, simple, even silly perhaps, but the tenor voice that sang it so softly glorified the homely air.

The swift Indian summer twilight of the plains came and went; and still the yellow haired man sat in the dim room by the open window, and sang old lullaby. The song went steadily on, and presently the body was still, except for the feverish breathing.

Out in the darkness a night hawk fell, seemingly from the very clouds almost to the earth, uttering as he turned to begin his ascent, his weird, booming, discordant cry.

The door opened softly and some one tiptoed into the room.

"Paul," a low voice said, "your cue comes in five minutes. You must go now."

The yellow haired man left the sleeping child softly on the bed and followed the new comer out into the darkness.

He staggered weakly as they strode along the dark street, and once would have fallen had not his comrade caught him.

"Take my arm, Paul," the comrade said.

The impromptu opera house, a new half finished building, with a "make-shift" stage and scenery, was crowded to overflowing.

The citizens of Scuddy were present almost to a man, and even the cowboys from as far out as the Yellowhammer and Spade ranches were in attendance.

The performance had been going on for some time when the yellow haired tenor appeared. He came upon the stage with unsteady, stumbling steps. His yellow hair was tossed about and his face was drawn and pallid. When he began to sing the audience regarded him with marked disfavor. He was intoxicated, they thought. His tones were inharmonious and often almost harsh and broken by choking catches, now and then, as if the singer had smothered a sob in his throat. Then as his voice soared up, up, in a triumphant burst of music, it broke in a discordant, croak like sound, that completely destroyed the melody.

The cowboys began to hiss, and Jack Bates expressed his disfavor in an audible growl. The singer did not heed them, but continued his discordant, and, often, half inaudible song, as if it had been the most delightful melody in the world.

The cowboys yelled their disapproval at the top of their voices, and one or two fired off their pistols by way of protest.

The tenor ceased and one of the ladies began a song that was like the sweet music of a lark's liquid notes. A wild shout of applause arose from the cowboys, and Jack Bates stood up and cast his bouquet upon the stage. The yellow haired man leaned wearily against one of the supports of the impromptu scenery. Then as his turn came again, he broke into the lady's happy song with his doleful, tuneless croak.

The cowboys gave a howl of disgust and wrath and half a dozen of them started toward the stage, as if to wreak summary vengeance upon the miserable singer.

He ceased just as they reached the stage. Bending forward, he seized the bouquet that Jack Bates had thrown to the lady, and, without a word, the yellow haired man disappeared from the view of the audience. They heard the door of the back entrance slam behind him. Jack Bates, with a shout of wrath, dashed down the aisle and out into the darkness, followed by the half dozen irate cowboys and a few others.

A light was shining from the vine clad window in the "L" of the hotel when the angry little crowd reached it. The cowboys were for rushing into the hotel and severely drubbing the offending singer, but Jack Bates restrained them.

"Hold on," he said. "Le's see what the coward's a doin' first."

"What's he up to?" asked one.

"Look for yerself!" Jack whispered.

One by one they peered in through the morning glory vines, and each drew back without a word. Within the room the yellow haired man was kneeling beside the bed, with his face buried in his hands. His slight frame was shaking with sobs.

The little, pinched face of the baby was white now, and the painful gasping for breath had ceased. The baby had died alone while the father was away.

The little hands were folded across the small bosom, and upon them lay Jack Bates' boquet.

No sound came from the little mob outside except once, when the jingles on a cowboy's spur clanked against a fellow, and there was a sound from Jack Bates like an ill suppressed sob.

A dark figure came among them, and whispered for the crowd to follow him. It was the man who had called the yellow haired tenor to the performance.

"Boys," he said simply, "his wife died last month, leaving him alone in the world except for the baby. Last week the child was stricken with fever, and has grown worse ever since. Hardly a moment at a time has the baby been out of his arms, for the last few days and nights, and all that time he has barely closed his eyes for an instant in sleep. He has missed his meals to-day, for fear his absence would disturb the baby. The baby's dead, now. That's all, boys."

A few moments later an awkward squad, consisting of Jack Bates and the cowboys, entered the room where the yellow haired man knelt by the dead baby. Their hats were off and their bared heads were bowed. The man who had spoken outside was with them.

"Paul," he said, "here are some who wish to speak to you."

The yellow haired man rose to his feet and confronted them without a word. Jack Bates cleared his throat and began awkwardly:

"Pardner," said he, "yere's a leetle bundle we found in the road just now. Hit belongs to you an' the dead baby."

They turned and filled out into the darkness.

The tenor's comrade opened the little package that Jack Bates had placed on the bed. When the old, soiled handkerchief was untied there was revealed a little heap of money—gold, silver and notes to a goodly amount—the gift of Jack Bates and the cowboys.

Gray Costumes in Favor.

New York Post.

Gray costumes of every shade imaginable will be very fashionably worn this autumn and winter. The handsomest and most recherche gowns now worn in Paris are those in gray, the entire costume from bonnet to boot often matching in shade. An importer just returned from abroad exhibits an artistic dinner dress, which is as follows: The dress itself is in dove-gray cloth, the panels in plush of the same tint, striped with a much paler shade, and lined with silver-gray silk. The drapery of the Hungarian tunic is raised at each side in an easy yet deft manner. It looks as if one had caught up a length of it in a loop, much as one would do if pinning up a skirt before venturing out in the rain. Yet there is a method in this looping not easy to follow. The costume is completed by a cuirass bodice of the cloth, laced at the back, and ornamented with a sort of heart-shaped bib or (to borrow an expression from knight-errantry) gorget of plush, covered with a jingling network of old silver ornaments resembling coin.

In the lower house of congress a senate bill was called up for the construction of a building at Portland, Or., with an amendment reducing the appropriation from $500,000 to $350,000. An amendment was adopted further reducing the amount to $200,000.

The wife of J. Keurier, of the Theater Royal, Montreal, was burned to death. The accident was caused by the explosion of a lamp.

"Pride goeth before a fall." That is what makes the democratic party so boastful.

Polk County has interests to subserve greater than party and S. G. Comstock is the man best calculated to subserve the wishes of the people.

The republicans are not bragging much but everywhere they are doing good, solid work for the cause and our friends, the enemy, who are now so loud in their vain boastings will see the difference between a united working party and that of four years ago.

The Times says a border of crepe would fit the Harrison and Morton banner. It will require more money and brains than the democratic party can muster to drape that flag even with the aid of your prohibition allies. Better save your money for your own funeral, Mac.

McKenzie insists on electing a democrat to Congress if he has to sacrifice the Red Lake Pine to do it. Fortunately the people of Polk County do not feel that way. They know that Mr. Comstock is the best man for that business and they will vote for him regardless of party lines in this county. Mark the prediction, Mac.

The democratic party sees defeat staring it in the face, hence they have inaugurated their old style of mudslinging and will keep it up throughout the campaign. With every promise they ever made broken, they still have the cheek to ask the people to continue in office a man who openly said, before elected, that one term was enough for any man, and who solemnly promised if the people would elect him once he would never ask for it again! So far from fulfilling even that promise, he has set himself up as the dictator general, whose lightest word is law to his satelites. With the whole power of the administration he is seeking re-election, but in this enlightened age the people are not so easily hoodwinked, and Grover and his party will be held strictly accountable for all those broken promises. The people are getting tired of promises never kept and call for a new deal.

Notwithstanding the high character of a few individuals in the prohibition party, what they promise and what they perform is two different things. They say if the prohibition party should win there would be no more liquor sold. They claim the honor of the results in Dakota last fall and what are those results? Does any one for a moment suppose there has been any less quantity of liquor sold under the prohibitory laws than before? Nay, verily, and there never will be, even though prohibition should win in every State in the Union, UNLESS THE LAWS ARE ENFORCED. This is a point our prohibition friends seem to have wholly overlooked. Their theory seems to be that all you need to do is to vote for prohibition and leave the rest to take care of itself; but the fact is that when a law, like that, is made the work is only commenced, as it is often harder to enforce a law than to make it. The laws of Minnesota are the very best that could be obtained at present and, if enforced, would be of greater benefit to the citizens of the state. If these men, who profess so much, cannot take enough interest in the cause of morality to see that good laws are enforced, neither would they if the laws of the land prohibited the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors. Until they can succeed in passing a law that will enforce itself, their efforts will be unavailing.

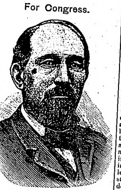
The Times says there is nothing in the platforms, (the republican and the democratic) except the tariff, and temperance which it gravely announces to be the only issues before the people. So far as the democratic platform is concerned we agree with the Times man as that document makes no other issue and makes no issue on those. In 1884 it made brilliant promises on the tariff question silently ignored the temperance question and by its action since failed to redeem its tariff promises and now, with a grand flourish of trumpets it endorses its 1884 platform and promises to live up to it just the same as it has before. What good does that do the country? Under its professions of friendship to the settler in the Northwest the democratic party has sent its spies here to harass him and cause him needless expense and a world of trouble. It has hounded the veteran soldier, kicking him out of office whenever and wherever possible and vetoing every bill for his relief that Congress has passed. It is the friend of the lost cause and would pay the rebel war debt if it dared. It promised to reduce the surplus but has made no effort to do it. It has by intimidation and fraud prevented southern republicans from the exercise of their rights of suffrage thus making "a solid south," and it has also as effectually deprived the thousands of voters in the territories of their inalienable rights under the constitution, and now it promises to keep right along in the same line of action. These are only a few among the many and against all these the republican party takes square issue promising relief from all of these evils. The records of the parties show that the republican party is the only one that has ever redeemed its promises and is therefore more entitled to the confidence of the people. Four years of misrule and broken promises has satisfied the American people of the futility of trusting to the hollow promises of the democratic party for reform and that party will be effectively snowed under this fall despite the power of the administration which is wielded unscrupulously. The Times sees no issue but the tariff. Neither does its party and all the people have to rely upon on that point is the hollow promises of the democratic party that are made only to be broken. If they had redeemed one single solitary promise they have made the people might possibly have some reason to hope that they would do something in the future, but after having by frauds in the south and a few republican mistakes in the north secured control of the government, run it for four years and broken every pledge they have made they have shown so plainly their incompetency to manage affairs that the people will tolerate it no longer.

THE COMING MAN.

Who Will be Sent to Congress from the Old Fifth

BY AN OLD-TIME MAJORITY.

For Congress.



Hon. S. G. Comstock.

Moorhead Daily News.

Hon. S. G. Comstock was born in Penobscot County, Maine, in 1842, and is in his 46th year. He was educated in the common schools and in the Wesleyan Seminary of Maine. He also attended the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, having left Maine in 1868, and emigrated into the great West to carve out fame and a fortune. His father was a farmer and lumberman, and the son assisted him in the business while at home. Before leaving his native State, Mr. Comstock studied law in the office of Judge Humphrey at Bangor, and completed his legal studies in the Michigan University. After leaving the University he went to Omaha, and was admitted to the bar in 1870. Here he practiced one year, and then went to Minneapolis where he remained however only about six or eight months, and studied law in the office of D. A. Secombe, Esq. About this time the settlement of the Red River Valley was begining to set in, and he joined the throng that westward took its way to carve out the empire of State. He arrived at the spot that now has the distinction of calling him a resident and citizen—Moorhead—in the fall of 1871. He was poor, but full of vigor, hope and talents. He opened a law office, and was shortly appointed by the board of county commissioners county attorney, which office he held and performed its exacting duties with great ability, honesty and success for six years. He dropped out of active practice of law in 1884, his real estate business and legislative duties taking up his entire time. In 1880 he formed a partnership with A. A. White Esq., to deal in real estate and townsites and the firm has met with unqualified success.

His legislative service commenced in 1875, he having been returned by the people to the lower house of the Minnesota legislature, and he has been elected to the house or senate at every election since except in 1878, when he declined to run. He served in the house until 1883, when he was promoted to the senate, in which body he has served three sessions, viz: 1883, 1885 and 1887, and has the session of 1889 before him, making in all 14 years of legislative service. He early took a leading position in the house, and has been invariably connected with prominent committees, and as a matter of course prominently identified with the most vital legislative questions and enactments of the day. At the last session he was chairman of the judiciary committee of the senate, the leading committee. He was also chairman of the temperance committee, and was a member of the railroad, normal school and public school committees. He assisted largely in forming the railroad bill that passed in 1885. In 1882 he was made by his friends a candidate for attorney general and only lacked three votes of nomination. In 1884 he was made a candidate for lieutenant governor, but made no active canvass for the place. He has frequently been mentioned for governor.

In 1874, Mr. Comstock was married to Miss Sarah Ball, of Minneapolis. They have three children, two bright girls and a bouncing big baby boy, who is the pride of his father's as well as mother's heart.

Harrison and Morton.

From every State in the Union comes expressions of great satisfaction at the nomination of Harrison and Morton and everywhere the republican party seems confident of an overwhelming victory. By fraud and intimidation the democrats had secured a "solid" south and it only required a few mistakes on the part of the republicans to change the deal in 1884. The republican party goes into this campaign united and will win the victory.

A Gentleman of Unchallenged Ability and Character.

St. Paul Globe: C. H. Graves, of Duluth, who was the recipient of a number of complimentary ballots at the St. Cloud convention yesterday, was among last evening's arrivals at the Merchants. "It was a harmonious convention throughout," he remarked, "and the same spirit will prevail during the campaign. It was recognized from the outset that only one of the contestants could be nominated, and while each candidate exerted himself to the utmost, knowing that a nomination was equivalent to an election, still there were no personalities engendered. No one will work any harder for Mr. Comstock than myself, and from personal knowledge, derived from talks with those opposing him, the same feeling prevails with them."

The Silliest Yet.

The Times says: "If the reservation was opened, the lumber carrying trade of the Manitoba railway would be ruined and Bro. Cooke can wager his last dollar that Mr. Comstock will never do anything to injure that corporation."

The above is but a fair sample of the Times leading editorials against the republican candidate for congress and its only effect is to show people how easy it is to make an assertion. In this case it also shows how easy it is for McKenzie to tell a deliberate falsehood about one of the most honorable and upright men in the district, a man whose premises have always been kept whose character is unassailable. Mr. McKenzie seems to have a very excellent opinion of himself to think people will take his unsupported word in a matter of so much importance as is this pine question. The people are in dead earnest about it and they will support for congress the man best able to subserve their interests on this question. Mr. Comstock has pledged his word of honor, if elected to use his best endeavors to secure that pine to this country; he is from a section of country that desires the pine as much as we do, therefore local interests ally him still more closely to the project if that could be possible; moreover he is a man of great legislative experience and it will not take him many weeks in congress to acquire the same great influence that he wields in the state legislature. The Times unsupported statements that Mr. Comstock will not do anything for us gives the lie direct to Mr. Comstock's pledged word that he will do all in his power to secure that pine. Mr. Comstock has a reputation all over the state of being a man of truth and veracity—an honorable, upright man who would not tell a lie to subserve his own interests or that of his party, while Mr. McKenzie is only known in this "little neck of the woods" and known to be a democrat for revenue only. Mr. Comstock has a reputation at stake and could not afford to lie to us even if it was possible for him to do so. Judging by the recklessness with which the Times man accuses honest men of being liars we should judge that such is not the case with McKenzie. He asserts that the Manitoba road will lose its lumber business if the reservation is opened, and that for this reason the Manitoba will oppose it. If this be true why did not the Manitoba prevent the building of the Walker mills which practically destroyed its carrying trade from Minneapolis? Far from being a detriment to that road it would be a help furnishing a much larger carrying trade to it. The Times will have to invent something else.

The Duluth Evening Journal does not like it because Senator Steenerson dared to question Gil. Hartley's assertion in the convention that the State of Minnesota would give Depew 50,000 and the Fifth District would give him 15,000, and proceeds to score Steenerson at a great rate saying "the greatest mistake Mr. Hartley has made this year was to pick this young swell-head up and carry him to Chicago." Indeed! Well, who in thunder is Gil. Hartley anyhow, that he should carry the whole Fifth District around in his vest pocket and carry whomsoever he liked to Chicago with him? It looks very much like arrogance to say that Gil. Hartley or any other man could dictate to that convention who should and who should not go, and we do not believe that Mr. Hartley himself authorized any such fool statement. The writer of this article was in that convention, and knows that Mr. Hartley got as much support from Mr. Steenerson's friends as he could or did give Mr. S. and we think a great deal more. The statement that Polk County was not for Mr. Steenerson is as false as is the statement that he was for Gresham and for that reason assumed that the whole district was. There were eight delegates, six of whom were for Mr. Steenerson first, last and all the time during the convention and the other two were promised him but went back on the agreement, one of them nominating one of our own delegates, Mr. E. D. Childs, who promptly withdrew his name. While it is true that the convention was not unanimously for Gresham it is equally true that a large majority was and the resolution to instruct was not voted down because there were not Gresham men enough to have put it through, but because it was deemed inexpedient to send an instructed delegation. The writer of this article was a Gresham man but he voted against the resolution to instruct. Mr. Steenerson himself was orignally as strong a Blaine man as Mr. Hartley professed to be, but his experience in the Fifth District Convention and in the State Convention convinced him that the State was for Gresham and he was man enough not to go to Chicago and misrepresent his district by deserting her man before a gun was fired. Mr. Hartley was understood to be a Blaine man but those who voted for the resolution presenting his name as a delegate at large were given to understand that he would stay with his delegation in any action they saw fit to take. Mr. Steenerson was no more surprised at Mr. Hartley's action in the Chicago Convention than were the large majority in the Fifth District who did not then, and do not now, agree with Mr. Hartley, that this district would swallow whole anybody who might happen to be nominated. The people of this district generally have minds of their own, and are not to be led around by the nose by bosses and this fact would have been made very emphatic if the young man from Duluth could have had his way in that matter. The man who says that this district could have been made to swallow Depew is either a maniac or a fool who does not understand the temper of the dwellers upon these broad prairies. Depew's nomination would have meant a democratic majority in this past of the district at least, and no party whip that ever cracked could have changed that result. Minnesota was clearly in favor of Gresham. This fact all her delegates well knew and for one of her representatives to second the nomination of any other man thus placing her in the wrong light was wholly out of place and uncalled for and Mr. Steenerson but discharged his duty and voiced the sentiments of his district and his state when he protested against it.

The democrats are doing a heap of tall "whistling in the graveyard" to keep their courage up. They see the hand-writing on the wall and know that their days are numbered.

The Times man already makes his boasts that he carries Polk County in his vest pocket. He has evidently taken the contract to carry the county for some democratic aspirant for congressional honors, and before he even knows who or what he is he urges the people to get ready to vote for the unknown. They will not be very liable to leave an honest, upright, capable man, a man from their own midst for some foreigner who has no interest in us locally or otherwise. You can't deliver the goods, Mac.

The Republican convention at Chicago covered the temperance question fully in a resolution passed just before the adjournment, leaving no reason why any temperance man cannot heartily support the republican ticket this fall. That party is the only one that ever did anything to promote the temperance cause and the only one that ever will. They will be re-instated this fall by an old time majority.

Just now the democrats are trying to bolster up their failing courage by saying among themselves: "The prohibition party is going to be very strong this fall and every one of those votes is just so much in our favor." They are even considering the project of endorsing the prohibition nominee for Congress in vain hope of defeating the republican nominee. Never mind. The people have not all gone wild, and the republican cause will triumph by a large majority.

DULUTH, Special Telegram to Pioneer Press, June 28.—Hon. S. G. Comstock, republican candidate for congress in this district, spent the day here in looking over the condition of politics, and in making the acquaintance of the people of Duluth. In a talk with the Pioneer Press correspondent he expressed himself as well satisfied with the outlook in all parts of the district, and was especially pleased over the friendly feeling found in this city. He is watching the democratic situation in the district with some interest, and expects to see them nominate either F. B. Nash or Canning, of the Farmers' Alliance, but doubts if the triple alliance proposed by the democracy, free traders and prohibitionists of the district can be carried out. He saw no change in the gubernatorial situation, though there were evidences that a good many republicans were becoming disgusted with the whole situation, as regards the present canvass.

Duluth Evening Herald: The delegates to the district convention say that nothing was developed that tends to show who is likely to be the preference of the 5th district for the governorship. Indeed; some of them say they did not bear the subject mentioned.

The Profit in Live Stock.

Breeders' Gazette.

At a recent farmers' club in Michigan one person raised the question as to whether it paid to raise stock, declaring he "had made some very close experiments weighing and feeding, and could not yet figure out a margin of profit for himself." It is not likely that it would pay if one were to get into the markets and purchase everything which it consumes, but the conditions under which live stock is grown upon the farms are altogether different. On every farm there is considerable inferior grain and hay, practically without commercial value, which nevertheless makes very profitable stock food, and which in point of fact constitutes a very considerable portion of its support, and there are incidental products, like straw, stalks, and chaff, which but for the value that live stock is capable of extracting, would go to utter waste.

There is much coarse herbage consumed by it which the farmer can neither eliminate from his fields with any reasonable amount of labor nor possibly turn into merchantable products. There are "gleanings" in all the fields after the farmer has finished the most careful harvest and gathering of the crops, and there are aftermaths and second growths of various descriptions which could never be profitably prepared for market, but which contribute not a little to the growth and support of the live stock. It gathers and turns to profitable use without involving any expense on account of labor the grass growing in the pastures and upon all portions of the farm not under actual tillage. In short its principal support is derived from products otherwise without material value or which have not been reduced to a merchantable condition. Besides, its presence enlarges the number of field crops which can be grown with profit, and opens the way for the most intelligent and profitable rotation, for in its absence all manner of root crops, as well as clover and grass (except for hay,) would be eliminated from the list of profitable crops open to the farmers' selection. Finally, the rotation which it permits and the manure it distributes in the fields or leaves around the stabling and feeding lots is the means of sustaining whatever degree of fertility the farm possesses, renders the profitable production of general crops possible, and prevents the farm from sinking speedily into a state of absolute sterility. So, even if a farmer cannot always take his pencil and figure out just what profit he is making from the growth of his live stock, or just what advantage has been secured each day and hour, the final aggregate results show that it has made good money for its owner. Farmers who have devoted themselves mainly to its production have generally grown rich, and while the farmer may not be able to measure his profit with the same precision as in any other matters, he knows that the sales of live stock and live stock products constitute a very large proportion of the income of the farm.

At the same time it must not be supposed that the character of the stock maintained is a matter of indifference. There is considerable merchantable product fed out first and last, and unless the stock is of an improved character a loss is likely to be made on this, which of course cuts down the profits which are realized from other sources of growth, and perhaps dissipates them altogether; and it is also important that the pasturage and course fodders be turned to the largest and very best account, which only stock of an improved character, can accomplish. There is abundant occasion for a farmer to figure elaborately as to the comparative profits to be realized from various descriptions of stock. Indeed, it is an encouraging sign to find him indulging in figures of this sort, since the difference between the improved breeds and the inferior and common sorts is so great that a careful examination of the subject will be sure to impress any intelligent farmer with the great advantages to be secured by keeping only the improved sorts. But to enter upon calculations as to whether the maintenance of any description of stock is profitable is time thrown away, since the experience of the world, extending through thousands of years, since the day our ancestors were nomads wandering in the desert with no other visible wealth than their heards and flocks, has settled that point beyond the possibility of any intelligent dispute.

Duluth Evening Journal: G. G. Hartley feels highly satisfied with the work done at the St. Cloud convention. He says: "The remainder of the state should follow the example set by the republicans of the Fifth district who have nominated a man for congress who would be a credit to any district in the United States. If the other districts will nominate men like Comstock the State will go republican by 50,000 majority."

Going West.

The general interest that has been taken in the opening of the Montana Indian Reservations is shown by the large numbers of people who have already gone to Great Falls to investigate the mineral and agricultural resources of that wonderful country. The low excursion rate announced by C. H. Warren, Gen. Pass. Agent of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway, makes the expense of exploring this country merely nominal, and will undoubtedly result in a still larger number following. [4-11]

But very few people are aware of the amount of adulteration there is in the different lines of food products. Sugars, jellies, butter and cheese are all liable to adulteration when brought from eastern markets. When in want of a pure article of cheese, call on Hartshorn, Hurlbut & Co. or B. Clements and ask for Hallock cheese which is warranted absolutely pure and full cream stock. By so doing you secure a good article while you encourage home manufacture.

MONTANA SHORT LINE.

When traveling every one should consider well the questions of economy, comfort, safety and speed, these questions being of the same importance in a journey of an hour as in one of several days' ride. An examination of the map will convince anyone that this is the most direct route to and from all the principal points in Central and Northern Minnesota, Dakota and Montana. ST PAUL MINNEAPOLIS MANITOBA RAILWAY. Our equipment and time are excellent. Our rates are the lowest, but this fact is something which speaks for itself. Definite figures and maps can be obtained by applying to any Agent of the Company, or the General Passenger Agent.

The following are a few of the Principal Points reached via this Line:

ST. CLOUD, SAUK CENTRE, FERGUS FALLS, CROOKSTON, ST. VINCENT, HUTCHINSON, PAYNESVILLE, MORRIS, APPLETON AND BRECKENRIDGE, MINN.; WATERTOWN, ABERDEEN, ELLENDALE, WAHPETON, FARGO, GRAND FORKS, GRAFTON, DEVILS LAKE, BOTTINEAU AND BUFORD, DAKOTA; GLASGOW, DAWES (FT. BELKNAP), ASSINNIBOINE, FT. BENTON, GREAT FALLS, HELENA AND BUTTE, MONTANA; WINNIPEG, MANITOBA, AND ALL PACIFIC COAST POINTS.

Parties seeking farms or business locations will find unusual opportunities for both on this line in Northern Dakota and Montana, also in Minnesota where the Company has for sale at low prices and on favorable terms 2,000,000 acres of excellent farming, grazing and timber lands. JOHN CROMB, Chairman Congressional Convention.

Detroit Tribune: The Republican ship is in good sailing order and it is piloted by conscience and inteligence. The old Democrat hulk has to be towed by a Buffalo tug, remarkable only for the size of its boiler.

Battle Lake Review: Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, and Levi P. Morton, of New York, were the strongest names before the convention at Chicago, and they will be the strongest before the people of the United States next November.

Duluth Evening Herald: The Fifth district has set a good example to the balance of the state by placing in nomination a man that would do credit to any district in any state in the union. As St. Louis county's representation in the next convention depends upon our vote for Comstock, it stands us in hand to do our duty, which will be done in good shape.

Duluth Evening Herald: Comstock was the second choice of almost every body at Duluth. That is to say a Duluth man was our first choice, and Stearns, Graves or Hartley would have been satisfactory, but the nomination of a Duluth man proving impossible, Comstock was preferable to any other. Barto would have given satisfaction to many, but Comstock is far more satisfactory to the people generally.

St. Peter Tribune: The Democrats will hardly attempt a serious fight against Comstock, the Republican nominee for congress in the Fifth district. It is a foregone conclusion there just as it is here in the Second district, where the Democrats are really contemplating putting up Tommy Bowen against John Lind. It is cruel to mock the Sleepy Eye statesman in that way.

Verndale Journal: The nomination of Senator Comstock for member of congress from the Fifth district meets with the hearty and sincere approval of the Journal, although we could easily and gladly have given our support to any of the gentleman who were candidates before the convention. We have known Mr. Comstock long and favorably, and have watched his legislative career with pride for many years. We have had occasion to differ sharply with him during that period, but this does not mar our admiration for him as a public servant of ability and good judgment, a wise and far-seeing legislator, and an honest, safe and upright man. We believe it would have been impossible for the convention to act more wisely than it did in selecting Mr. Comstock as its nominee, and we feel assured that the Fifth district will not regret, but rather have increasing cause to rejoice over the result as the worth of his services are manifested during the succeeding two years that he shall serve us. Should the remaining republican conventions of the several districts of our commonwealth be as fortunate in their selections, Minnesota will not only send five republican members to congress, but also five as able and discreet representatives as shall fall to the lot of any State within the Union.

Republican Tariff Revision.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

It is reported from Washington that when the Mills bill reaches the senate that body will present and pass a substitute that will be a thorough revision of the present tariff.

The Republican party is definitely committed to the protection of American industry against foreign competition. The existing tariff is by no means perfect. It needs intelligent revision to adjust it to present conditions. The Mills bill is not such a revision. The only merits that measure has are its tendency toward free trade and its adaptation to the wants of English manufacturers and merchants. Such merits are not altogether appreciated in this country.

The Republicans in the senate will do a wise thing by adopting a well-considered, positive measure of tariff revision made on the basis of protection to American interests. Mere opposition to the crude Democratic measure is not enough. The Journal urged the Republicans in the house to take such a course. But a senate substitute will answer every purpose and will perhaps be more likely to be prudently drawn than if made in the lower house. There are some good Republican brains in the senate.

The Prohibition Vote in 1888.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

Will the prohibitionists do as effective work for the democracy this year as in 1884?

We doubt it. Of course the irreconcilables and those in democratic pay, will be as active and enthusiastic now as then.

But there is a considerable number of temperance men who have learned that the democrats are always and everywhere, at least in northern states, They have learned that whatever has been done to lessen the power of that interest has been done by republicans. They realize that the republican party in nearly every state in the nation at large is definitely committed to temperance reform. They see that the only hope of any rational success for that reform lies either in that party or a non-partisan combination. They are disgusted with being used as mere catspaws to pull democratic chestnuts from the fire.

For these reasons we do not believe that the prohibition vote will be as large relatively in 1888 as in 1884.

Asserts Its Independence.

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

The Duluth News is a staunch republican newspaper but unable to swallow the new republican platform on the tariff. Its republicanism has therefore been questioned and it gets back at its critics as follows:

"This paper has been criticised in high tariff quarters because of the opposite stand it has taken towards the tariff plank in the republican platform and at the same time giving an unwavering support to the presidential candidate. But that is easily accounted for, if the reader will take time to thoroughly investigate. The News has always since its birth advocated tariff reform—to lower duties as fast as safety to American industries would warrant reduction. It has been in direct line with the majority of the republican party in so doing. The party heretofore has always pledged itself to such a policy. Its recognized leaders in the senate and house have advocated tariff reduction on that basis. Its presidents from Lincoln down have expressed such views and put forward their best efforts to obtain for the people the passage of such laws. The News does not advocate free trade and never did. It does not believe that free trade would be for the benefit of the nation. But having been on the side of tariff reform heretofore, it sees no reason to eat crow now—as some of our esteemed contemporaries have done—and blindly swallow a high tariff plank simply because it happens to be in a republican platform."

HE IS SURE TO WIN.

Gen. Harrison's Election to the Presidency Almost a Certainty.

An Independent Newspaper Gives Some Figures on the Electoral Vote.

Only Four Doubtful States, any Two of Which Will Defeat Cleveland.

From the Chicago Mail (Independent.)

A correspondent writes to the Mail asking for a candid statement as to the relative chances of success of the republican and democratic parties in November next. This, in the Mail's opinion, is not a difficult task so far as the present condition of things goes. Here is the showing:

Rep. States.	Electoral Vote.	Dem. States.	Electoral Vote.
California	8	Alabama	10
Colorado	3	Arkansas	7
Illinois	22	Deleware	3
Iowa	13	Florida	4
Kansas	9	Georgia	12
Maine	6	Kentucky	13
Massachusetts	14	Louisiana	8
Michigan	13	Maryland	8
Minnesota	7	Mississippi	9
Nebraska	5	Missouri	16
Nevada	3	North Carolina	11
New Hampshire	4	South Carolina	9
Ohio	23	Tennessee	12
Oregon	3	Texas	13
Pennsylvania	30	Virginia	12
Rhode Island	4	West Virginia	6
Vermont	4	Total	153
Wisconsin	11
Total	182

DOUBTFUL STATES.

Connecticut	6
Indiana	15
New Jersey	9
New York	36
Total	66

The total number of votes in the electoral college is 401; necessary to elect, 201. There is not much doubt as to the correctness of the classification which appears above. Democrats may claim Michigan as doubtful, and republicans may claim West Virginia, but the only states where, at the present time, the advantage is not with one party or the other are the four here classed as doubtful. Reasoning must be in relation to the outcome in those states.

If the republicans carry New York they win the presidency; if they lose New York and Connecticut, but carry Indiana and New Jersey they win; if they lose both New York and New Jersey and carry Indiana and Connecticut, they win. On the other hand, if the democrats carry only New York they lose; if they carry both New York and New Jersey, and neither Connecticut nor Indiana, they lose; if they carry New York and Connecticut, New Jersey nor Indiana, they lose; if they carry Indiana, Connecticut and New Jersey, and do not carry New York, they lose. The democrats to win must, in short, carry New York and Indiana of the doubtful states, or New York, Connecticut and New Jersey.

With the prospect in each of the four doubtful states republicans have no reason to be dissatisfied. The bitterest mugwump in New York has nothing to say against Harrison, and only those of the group will remain with the democracy who happen to be with that party on the tariff issue; the republican factions of the state are united for the first time for years and will work enthusiastically and determinedly together for victory; Morton, the republican candidate for the vice presidency, is deservedly popular and is a power; the voice of Blaine will be heard in the canvass, and the Irish-American voters recognize in Harrison his legitimate heir where their interests are to be conserved. New York should be carried by the republicans.

Indiana is the home of Harrison. He ran ahead of his ticket when he ran for governor. He is trusted and believed in there, as he deserves. The democracy of the state is split into factions. The Gray men went home bitter from the St. Louis convention. Even in the brief interval since the republican convention the wave of enthusiasm over the ticket has swelled to grand proportions. Indiana will support her son.

If the tariff issue should have force anywhere, if men should be republicans from interest, if nothing more, certainly it should be the case in Connecticut and New Jersey. Free trade means for those states financial disaster, swift and certain; the closing of manufactories and the idleness and suffering of the masses. The people of those states are not without intelligence, and they will not vote for their own bankruptcy.

So stand the republican and democratic parties to-day. With admirable candidates, and a platform which they consider best for the interests of the country, the republicans expect to win. With thousands of office-holders working to retain their places four years longer, the democrats are not less confident. The Mail is confident as to the issue.

Free Whisky.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

Who are most in favor of maintaining the internal revenue tax on whisky?

The distillers.

The tax operates as a sort of protective tariff for them. Cheap competition is prevented by United States detectives and marshals. Recently a great whisky trust has been formed. Only a certain number of distilleries are to run, while all holders of trust certificates are to get dividends. This can be done because the United States tax keeps down the number of distillers within manageable limits. Thus the profits of this great combination of whisky makers are based on the internal revenue system.

What real economic argument is there in favor of keeping the tax?

Whisky is a luxury and hence ought to bear a heavy burden of taxation.

This is sound doctrine. Whisky is not a necessary of life, whatever some honest citizens may think about it. And whisky is undoubtedly the cause of considerable evil in society. Then it fairly follows that it should either be prohibited altogether or should be heavily taxed. The only real point at issue is with reference to the authority with which should be lodged the power to prohibit or to tax.

No one who has made intelligent study of the growth and nature of temperance sentiment can doubt that the only practical way of dealing with the liquor question is by leaving it to relatively small political units—to those that come in close contact with the people and are quickly sensitive to popular desire. Prohibition by the nation is utterly impracticable. Prohibition by a state is possible. Prohibition by a county or town is actual and effective.

What is true of prohibition is equally true of regulation and taxation. These can be done better by small communities than by large ones.

If the United States takes the internal revenue tax from whisky, it by no means follows that this liquor will go untaxed. States will be prompt to avail themselves of this fiscal resource. The same principle of taxing luxuries will be the basis of the state tax. Whisky will not escape. And it is easy to conjecture that the matter will be so regulated that the price will not go down, but that trusts will not be so easy to establish and maintain.

Then the question of removing the national excise has no reference to making whisky free. It is merely a question of shifting the revenue from the nation, which does not need it, to the states, which do need it.

The Light of Science.

A Series of Articles on Drink from the Pen of an Analytical Chemist—The Constituent Elements of Beer and Their Effects on the System—Experiments with Gastric Juice and Alcohol.

FIRST PAPER.

[With the following article is begun a series of articles which have been written for The Voice by a professional analytical chemist of 25 years standing. The articles give the results of his own experiments and observations in the laboratory, and the only condition imposed by us on the writer was that they shall be written from a scientific standpoint alone, precisely as though they were written for a scientific journal that had no special interest in the so-called temperance reform. To this day we do not know the writer's position on the question of prohibition or total abstinence, and have never asked concerning it.—EDITOR THE VOICE.]

EDITOR THE VOICE.—At your request, I shall discuss the subject of alcoholic drinks in a series of articles written entirely from the standpoint of an analytical chemist, a profession that as kept me very busy for a quarter of a century.

It has been stated times innumerable, almost, at brewers' conventions that beer is our national beverage. This being the case (and the authority should be considered good), I will take up the subject of beer first—I mean good beer, such as the brewer would naturally send to a chemist for analysis; for, to their honor be it said, I have the names of brewers as regular laboratory customers on my books who despise anything in the way of adulteration.

By consulting my laboratory records, I find on a single page the analysis of five samples of beer, only two of which were sent from a single state, the rest being from sections thousands of miles apart. The following are the results copied from the record, the same as reported to the customers sending the tests:

	Water.	Alcohol.	Extractive Matter.
No. 1	91.59	4.99	3.42
" 2	87.50	7.16	5.34
" 3	89.67	6.33	4.00
" 4	87.16	5.94	6.90
" 5	90.34	5.13	4.53

Taking these as fair average, and any brewer will call them good, we strike a general average of these five samples and we have the following:

Water.	Alcohol.	Extractive Gums.
89.252	5.91	4.838

Thus giving us good average beer composed of nearly ninety per cent of water, alcohol less than six per cent, and of the extractive bitter principle which you and I are asked to believe renders lager healthy and wholesome, less than five per cent. With all candor and sincerity in the world, let us ask which of these component parts in good beer are we to consider makes of it a temperance beverage, or what particular chemical reaction ensues when brought in contact which has such salutary effect upon the human organism as sustain its recommendation as a regular [illegible] drink?

Before passing to the practical results of alcohol in any form whatever, when brought in contact with the blood, membranes and viscera, we will look farther into the other component parts of the compound before us. We have, in good beer, about one and a third per cent. of sugar, vinegar, cripulim, the bitter extractive principle of hops, and carbonic acid gas, thus producing a specific blending of perishable, unstable compounds, chiefly by means of putrefaction (for be it known, there are no chasms deep and wide separating fermentation from putrefaction or decomposition,) which renders the combination of two elements a preserver of a third, and so on through the analysis. The more perfect these results, the better the beer and the longer it will keep "alive."

In view of this, the question is often asked the chemist and physician if beer is wholesome, especially for the invalid and dyspeptic, it being claimed by many that by its moderate use the stomach is stimulated, thus exciting to action those glands which provide the digestive fluids. From a medical chemical standpoint there is nothing given in the foregoing analysis, save the sugar, that has any property whatever of supplying the waste and consumption of animal tissue. The alcohol may tend to harden and preserve some of the soft ones, but this is a hindrance rather than assistance, as will be shown when we come to the analysis of the viscera, blood, etc., further on. Again, any and all substances which arrests that strange phenomena of fermentation or decomposition (render impotent the sporadic germs, the animal that does not cause it, but is it) must, with like effect, prevent digestion, merely another name for the same process. Does alcohol do this? Ask the curator of any museum how to preserve any animal specimen and prevent its decomposition, and he will tell you immerse it in alcohol and water half and half.

Furthermore, in so far as the digestive juices of the stomach are concerned, no other element can aid (a critical analysis fails to show the faintest trace of anything found in beer) except oxygen and the components parts of water, and no one at this day and age would attempt to show that the ninety-odd per cent. of water it is known to contain renders beer wholesome and healthy, when taken in moderate quantities, for any one in his right mind knows that water without the "hinderances" can be obtained much cheaper.

Some proofs other than those of chemistry are demanded, hence the following practical demonstration suggests itself—a test I was called to make since beginning this article. A gentleman friend brought some gastric juice for a test. After seperating in two portions, one part was subjected to analysis, while in part of the other was placed animal muscular fiber (finely chopped fresh beef) which at the expiration of ten hours was all digested, while another portion placed in a saturated solution—ten of juice to four of alcohol—was unchanged after the expiration of ten hours, and the ferment of the gastric juice was precipitated, accounting for the absence of digestion in this test. Of course, it is not to be understood that this test applies particularly to beer, inasmuch as of itself it contains an insufficiency of alcohol to attain these results. Nevertheless, as has been shown by analysis, beer does contain alcohol and just in proportion that it contains alchohol is it an injury to digestion when taken into the stomach.

I say an injury and speak advisedly. Others have said it before I was born, but with a half dozen noble exceptions they have failed to give technical and at the same time comprehensible reasons why it, or any alcoholic beverage, is not only unhealthy, but positively pernicious. In the next paper I will examine the blood, and the effects upon it, when brought in contact with substances containing even the smallest amount of alcohol.

NEW ALBANY, Ind. J. F. ELSOM.

Hoard's Dairyman: We often see comparative statements made showing some of the advantages of dairy farming over grain raising in the matter of freights—the cost of which all comes out of the farmer, for the consumer only sends back to the farm what is left after paying what the product has been tolled on the road, by the speculators and transportation companies. For instance, we have the facts from one county in Minnesota, where it cost the wheat growers $115,000 to pay the freight on half a million dollars worth of wheat that left the county. A half million dollars worth of cheese, over the same rails, would cost $15,000. The same value of butter, about $7,000. A clear saving of 100,000 to one county might have been obtained, in a year, by dairying instead of wheat raising.

That is one view and the one that comes to the surface first, pat and practical, still it is not the main one. The deeper and better view is, that the county that keeps trying to farm that way, year after year, will find that it has less wheat to ship per annum—will find the wheat producing capacity of the soil gone. While the county that keeps the stock to produce half a million dollars worth of butter and cheese, instead of deteriorating in yield of these staples, will find the soil growing better. So that instead of being able to keep less stock, will be able to feed more and thus actually increase its productive capacity.

What is true of a county is true of a farm, and true of every farmer who intelligently and persistently feeds his land through stock-feeding, instead of robbing it through exclusive grain raising and a constant shipping of the gross products of the soil that produces them.

How Moorhead Celebrated.

Special to the Evening Journal,

MOORHEAD, July 5.—The Fourth was celebrated at Moorhead in fine shape. The largest crowd in the history of the city was there, many coming from towns on both sides of the river. Rev. C. F. Bronson's oration was highly commended as a patriotic effort, well delivered. An industrial and fireman's parade, races, sports, ball games, music, fireworks, a dance and general hilarity marked the day.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

'Round Home.

Hon. Marcus Johnson was in the city last week.

Miss Anna Hancock passed the Fourth in town.

The State convention will probably be called about Sept. 5th it is said.

Miss Agnes and, Mamie Kops were visiting friends in the city last week.

A rousing old time is expected on Monday evening next. Don't fail to be there.

Mr. Burt Bruce was over from Dak. celebrating the Foruth with his relatives south of the city.

Geo. McManus' handsome brother, Ed., was over from Devil's Lake on Monday to interview Mac.

Our Euclid and Angus letters arrived last week too late for last issue, owing no doubt, to the Fourth.

Miss Alice Childs has driven to and from her school, four miles west of Carman, every day, regardless of mud.

The County Board will meet as a Board of Equalization on Wednesday July 18th and as a County Board on Monday, July 23d.

The Crookston team will enter at the shooting tournament, to take place at Fargo, on Thursday and Friday of next week. Success go with you, boys.

Mr. Stockwell, of Grand Rapids, Mich., a guest of Mr. S. M. McKee, conducted a union praise service, in the M. E. Church, last Sunday p. m.

One of the fire boys mounted the ladder, on Monday evening, in 4½ seconds, said to be ½ second better than was made at the Forks, on the Fourth.

C. Olson, of Garden, dropped in last week to set that subscription ahead one year and report progress. Thinks we have had more rain up here than they have.

Everybody should attend the ratification meeting on Monday evening next at the opera house. Bring your wives and daughters as well as the boys and enjoy an old-fashioned ratification meeting.

We have only one note and mortgage we make a loan the day applied for, charge no bonus, and make interest payable at our office in Crookston.

Steenerson & McManus.

John J. Johnson, represented the town of Garden in the city last week. He informs THE JOURNAL that the crops are worthy the name of the town, looking splendidly and not too much rain.

The Harrison club, of Grand Forks, fifty strong or more expects to cross the ruby next Monday evening and take a hand in the ratification. Dakota says she cannot vote for the President but she can and will make a heap big noise for Harrison and Morton. Let all true republicans raily 'round the colors. Come everybody.

Theodore Holton, the rustling machine dealer of Larimore, spent Saturday night in the city, en-route to his old home in Lake Park. Theo. used to be one of the leading political lights in Becker County and it is galling to him to think that he now lives in a country of school-boys—where a man cannot vote for President.

We refer to farmers to whom we have made loans as to our promptness in dealing with them. Our old customers always recommend their neighbor to us.

Steenerson & McManus.

The Salmagundi Club met last Friday evening at the residence of Mr. J. W. Wheeler. The following program was rendered and listened to with interest: Vocal Duet; Mrs. Wheeler and Mr. Gallasch. Paper—J. Fennimore Cooper, Mr. Peterson. Guitar Solo, Mr. Lieck. Reading, with comments, from Holmes, Mr. Wheeler. Duet—Violin and Flute, Messrs. Kelso and Milne.

Mr. Edward Lanctot, of Gentilly, one of the progressive farmers of Polk County, brought a fine three months old colt to town on Tuesday, and, just for luck put the little chap on the scales. The filly kicked the beam at 470 lbs. which is considered something extra by good judges. The sire of the colt is Mr. Laframboise' horse King Tom, a fine English Draught horse and the dame a Clyde mare.

The democratic party makes great boasts that it is the only friend of the people among the parties. Why don't they do more and brag less? Why don't they admit the citizens of Dakota to their full rights of citizenship? Why don't they protect every voter in the "solid south?" Why don't they go to work and reduce the surplus instead of doing so much blowing and accomplishing nothing?

We should think it would be galling to the pride of every honest northern democrat to reflect that at his best he is only the tail to the democratic kite. The "solid south," maintained by fraud and intimidation, comprises all the substance there is to the democratic party and absolutely controls its actions dictating its policy wholly, and all a northern democrat has to do is simply to vote with his party with no voice in framing its policy or apparently any other interest in its welfare. It is but natural that the brains of the party should rule but quite a comment that there are none north of Mason and Dixon's line.

RATIFICATION!

GRAND

REPUBLICAN RALLY!

The Republicans of Polk County will hold a Grand Ratification Meeting at the OPERA HOUSE;

—ON—

Monday, Evening, July 16th.

Noted Speakers from abroad, assisted by home talent, will discuss the Living Issues of the day. The

HON. S. G COMSTOCK

Has accepted an invitation to meet with us and give us a little talk. The

FISHER CORNET BAND

Is expected to be on deck and discourse patriotic airs as occasion presents opportunities. All Republicans and all representative citizens interested in an honest government are cordially invited to attend.

COME ONE, COME ALL!

REPUBLICAN LEAGUE COMMITTEE.

R. A. Wilkinson was up on Saturday last returning to St. Paul on Sunday evening. He was very reticent on the subject of railroad improvements.

Powers & Wentzel have moved from their former stand on Main St., into the building adjoining the Fortier block on the south. They have a fine stock and do excellent work.

Hay bids fair to be more plentiful this year, as grass is reported to be better than for several years. Already the merry click of the mower is heard afield and some new hay has made its appearance in this market.

Hon. Roswell G. Horr, of Michigan, will address the citizens of Crookston and vicinity on the political issues of the day on Saturday evening July 21st. Mr. Horr is one of the most fluent speakers in the republican party. Let all turn out.

Mrs. Hugh Thompson died on Tuesday morning after a long and painful illness. She was one of the first settlers of Fisher where she has made many warm personal friends who extend to the bereaved husband and family their heartfelt sympathy.

That self-binder, offered by Rosenthal & Wile to the holder of the lucky ticket was won by Bert Hawkins, on ticket No. 1862. As he is not a permanent resident, being in with horses from Montana, he will no doubt have a machine to sell.

Until we saw that disappointed look on the handsome countenance of W. J. Nickle, after the Fourth, it never dawned upon us what he brought that sorrel jack rabbit up to Crookston for. The horse races advertised were unavoidably omitted.

Another Stock Farm.

Mr. K. D. Chase is building a large stock barn on his place north of town and, we are told, intends to put in dairy stock. This is one of the industries that is not overdone in our country and every farmer who is conducting it properly is not complaining of hard times. First-class cows have never sold in this market at losing prices and the same remark is true of good butter, while disappointment is sure to follow the attempt to make anything out of stock that will not pay for its keep. These facts ought to be so plain that no man would make the attempt to raise scrub stock and yet, of all the men who have tried stock-raising in this country how many have adopted the proper methods? Among those who have done so you will not find one single failure to make the business pay and make it pay well. We are told that Mr. Chase intends to put nothing but thoroughbreds of the best dairy breeds upon his place and we expect, in a few years to see one of the best stock farms to be found in the State. We shall watch the enterprise with interest and report its progress from time to time.

STRAYED.

The Ever Glorious.

Notwithstanding the rain on the evening of the third the morning of the ever glorious Fourth broke bright and beautiful and was heralded by the booming of Dr. Tooly's improvised cannon, yclept the anvil. Early in the day the teams began to arrive bringing in loads from near and from far and at ten o'clock our streets were crowded with pleasure-seekers all bent on having a good time. At ten the Ada Cornet band arrived and the procession was at once formed and marched to the opera house, where, underneath the trees adjoining a speakers' stand and seats had been provided and that portion of the exercises of the day was observed. An excellent program had been prepared and was carried out to the letter, and the assembled multitudes enjoyed them-selves to the fullest extent. In the evening the opera house wasthrown open and all of the devotees of Terpsichore proceeded to trip the hours away on flying feet or words to that effect.

FOURTH FANCIES.

Bro. McGrew, as marshall of the day was as dignified as a Sphynx, but it was evident to all cavalry vets that Mac did not belong to that arm of the service during the war.

Ed. Carey made the boss President, winning golden opinions.

D. Jacobus has not been so busy since the dam busted—he actually sweat.

The eggspression on Jack Freborn's face, every time a lucky thrower won a quarter was a study for an artist. However, more missed the mark than hit it, balancing the ledger on the right side for John.

The Ada Band is a daysie. So said the masses and so say we all of us.

Only two fights varied the program and they were sort 'o two-for-a-nickel affairs.

The water-cart and the sprinkler had a little misunderstanding and settled the matter a-la-Sullivan. Odds in favor of the sprinkler. Bad comment on the effects of too much cold water.

Owing to miserable roads the attendance was not so large as it would have been, but every street was crowded as it was, showing that a few people do live in Polk County.

Farm loans completed and money paid over the day application is made.

But very few people are aware of the amount of adulteration there is in the different lines of food products. Sugars, jellies, butter and cheese are all liable to adulteration when brought from eastern markets. When in want of a pure article of cheese, call on Hartshorn, Hurlbut & Co. or B. Clements and ask for Hallock cheese which is warranted absolutely pure and full cream stock. By so doing you secure a good article while you encourage home manufacture.

The Creamery.

This institution has at last got down to business and under the excellent managment of Messrs. Walsh & Bjoin bids fair to be a grand success. It only needs the hearty co-operation of the farmers to make it a grand success and a blessing to the county and especially to the farmers. The management pays 14 cents per inch for cream; an inch of cream will make a pound of butter. The market price of butter is 15 cents so that if you make your own butter and sell it you get just one cent a pound for your trouble. If you sell your cream all you have to do is to take proper care of it until the wagon comes along to receive it and you have your milk left sweet to feed your calves. The management intends to pay every cent for cream that the business will warrant and at present they are doing for the farmers far better than farmers can for themselves for they pay cash every thirty days and if you take your butter to the stores you must take it out in trade. There are now nearly 200 cows employed and there should be at least 1,000 which would enable the managers to pay more for the cream. The creamery can manufacture 500 lbs. per day and they are now running at about one-fifth capacity. It costs just as much to run as though it was doing its utmost and right here a lesson can be taught of the value of good cows. This is the very best season of the year and yet the average yield per cow will not exceed one-half pound when it ought, at the very least figure to be three times as much. It does not cost proportionately more to keep a cow that will make her two pounds of butter per day than it does to keep one that will make one-half or less. It is not impossible to get cows that will average two pounds per day for the season and no farmer should bother with a cow that will not make half of it. One cow that will make her two pounds per day is worth more than four that only make one-half in the best part of the season. When our farmers fully realize the significance of this plain truth and begin to build up the herd of two pound cows there will be no more complaints heard, such as we now sometimes hear, that "there is no money in cows." There is money in cows in countries where land is valued at from $50 to $200 per acre and the only reason why there should be none here is simply because we do not take pains enough to secure the right kind of cows. Give it a good trial once.

Woodside Items.

The "Glorious Fourth" was celebrated in grand style everywhere in this vicinity. The celebration held on the shore of the beautiful Lake Sarah, in the town of Knute, turned out splendidly. Quite a number from Woodside were present, and all seem to have enjoyed themselves well.

Mr. G. Stoddard is going to Crookston next month to make final proof on his claim.

Our Woodside farmers are expecting 40 bushels to the acre next fall.

Mr. A. C. Kasser made a flying visit home on the Fourth to see to his family and shake hands with old friends.

Wm. Roome got back from Crookslast Friday. He says that he will spend the rest of his days on his claim.

The annual school meeting in district No. 83 will be held at the Woodside school house, Saturday, July 21st.

Rev. A. J. Woodin, from the town of King, held service at the school house last Sunday. He has also started a Sunday school.

The boys have been talking of organizing a salvation army corps here, but we do not think they can do it, for there are not enough musicians around to keep the pot boiling. Boys, you had better wait until after the general election, next fall.

Politicians are beginning to stick ou their heads from every corner. But, in spite of all the canvassing and lecturing done by the different parties, the people in this vicinity will not be led astray; they are not duped so easily as that. Its queer to see how firm they all seem to stick to the "Grand Old Republican party." They have all, no doubt, long enough heads on them to look to their own interests.

Annual School Meetings.

To District Officers:

In addition to suggestions given in circular 12 from Supt. Kiehle, which has been sent to clerks, your attention is called to the following matters of general importance and interest:

1. Note carefully the length of schools you will have to provide for. All districts that have already maintained school three years or more will have to provide for five months, and children will be obliged to attend at least 40 days to entitle them to be enrolled for apportionment the succeeding year. Districts which have had less than three years will have to provide for four months of school and thirty days attendance will entitle to share in apportionment. New districts have to maintain four months of school but share apportionment upon total enrollment without regard to attendance.

2. To determine the amount of special tax necessary to raise, determine first the total cost of the school be it four, five or more months, state apportionment will be at least $3.50 for each scholar entitled to apportionment. To this may be added what will come from the county, which this year has been 83 cents—making the total apportionment something over $4.00. This multiplied by the scholars returned for apportionment, will represent the amount of help you will receive, and special taxes must do the rest. For the present, the poorer districts are instructed not to vote any extra tax as requisite for sharing in full apportionment. If it should be found necessary to do so, later on, district officers have authority to levy the tax. The above will not, of course, be a consideration with the wealthier districts, which will be expected to maintain all the school they possibly can support.

3. In making your estimates do not make a mistake and count upon getting cheap teachers; we hope their days are numbered. For districts to instruct by vote what wages shall be paid can by no means be made binding upon the trustees, and frequently hampers them in the faithful discharge of their duties. The law of supply and demand, together with the good sense of school officers concerning the kind of teachers required, must settle the question of wages. While it is doubtless true that teachers are better paid to-day in the country than ever before, and perhaps well enough paid for the work that is being done, yet as a guarantee that the people want better work, wages should not be allowed to become lower,

4. From the preceeding you will note the financial bearing of attendance. There are too many children kept from school for trivial reasons, or none at all. School terms should be so arranged that the majority of children can be spared from home, and attendance most rigidly insisted upon.

5. All districts finding it necessary to incur a bonded indebtedness should thoroughly understand the opportunity offered of securing money from the state at 5. per cent. to the amount of 3 per cent. on real estate valuation of district. Full explanations will be given upon application to either state or county Auditor or county Supt.

6. It is earnestly hoped that every district will make some provision for a school library. A fund has been provided from which all may receive help. Any district that will make appropriation for this purpose can get from the state as much as it so appropriates not to exceed twenty dollars the first year. Vote $5. and you get books to the amount of $10., etc. The amount so voted should be returned in the clerk's annual report and all necessary blanks will be fowarded.

7. Clerks should endeavor to mail their reports the Monday following the annual meeting. If errors are found there will then be ample time for their correction.

8. In the matter of houses, apparatus etc. a continuation of the liberal policy that has characterized the past year's work is advised. True economy cannot consist in denying to teachers such surroundings as will enhance the efficiency of their work. Yet there should be no extravagance. In school furnishing, every room should be supplied with good, comfortable seats and plenty of good blackboard surface. Then, as rapidly as possiple should be added reading charts, globe, outline maps and some form of physiological chart. In this last study placed by law in the common schools, as a county we occupy an advanced position due in great measure to the help that has been afforded teachers by the liberality of the patrons of the schools. Special attention needs to be given to the construction of the out houses. Too many of them are a positive nuisance and a glaring menace to the morals of the pupils. There should always be two, as widely separated from each other as the nature of the school grounds will admit. These should be kept neat and clean, and teachers held rigidly responsible for anything offensive or obscene that shall remain inscribed upon them.

9. Finally, as officers you are earnestly admonished to consider well the important offices you fill. If new officers are to be chosen, let them be from those in your midst who are the most intelligent, energetic, far-seeing and liberal-minded, All along the line of school work are indications of improvement, which will be more clearly seen in my forth-coming annual report. That advancement may continue I ask your co-operation and pledge you a continuance of my best efforts.

Ezra F. Elliot,
Co. Supt.

Crookston, July 10th, 1888.

WINGS.

Beautiful birds have plumes
Beautiful thoughts have we.
Stars shine high above the sight
Of earth's vague whispering
Under the earth's broad bosom
Never a beauty lies
But shall burn its way to the rim of day,
And flash to our wondering eyes.

Beautiful gems lie hidden
Under the fold of earth;
Even the slime hides a thought sublime
Till the time of the lily's birth.
Even the birds went creeping
Wingless and featherless,
Till plume by plume, like the roses' bloom,
They borrowed the singer's dress.

Beautiful birds have plumage,
Beautiful thoughts fly high;
The poet's song cannot slumber long,
Its track is the boundless sky.
Under the infinite heaven
Never a wing unfurled
But shall find its way to the verge of day,
And flash on some wondering world.

THE MOONSHINERS.

The girl closed the door of the crumbling spring house. Her expression was alert and expectant—her movements sluggish, almost dilatory; and yet a chilling wind whistled down the holes of the rotten roof, through the gaps and chinks between the worm eaten logs; it tossed her brown hair, crimsoned her pretty cheek, all unheeded. Miriam Sagsby did not feel the northerly gale. Her gaze fastened itself upon the thickets of laurel, sassafras and creeping bramble, where a narrow path, only a few yards away, abruptly disappeared. The spring bubbled out from under a huge rock, behind which ran a deep ravine where sunlight never penetrated the great pines, even at midday. The spot could not have been more wildly somber; but there was a safety in that black abyss, serviceable more than once within Miriam's memory. Her smile broadened into a pleased laugh as the lapping bushes were pushed aside, and a man looked warily about him before quitting their shelter—a man in the rough home-spun of a mountaineer, but with the handsome face, soft hands and indescribable aspect of one used to ease and luxury.

"It's you, Dr. Heathe!" she exclaimed in well feigned surprise.

"Who did you think it was, Miriam?" inquired Dr. Heathe, his keen, rapid glance darting with lightning rapidity into every dingy nook and remote shadow. There was something painfully apprehensive in the watchful scrutiny continually in those restless, suspicious eyes, as well as the firm, half menacing hold up the rifle always carried or at hand for instant use. "Have you seen any strangers?" he questioned.

"Strangers? How should I? Strangers don't come this a-way, onliest they're arfter the moonshiners," she laughed.

"Don't they?" he said, without echoing the laugh. "There are worse things than free stills."

"Last winter when I went down the ridge to Odds Corner to school, the guv'ment men were arfter the moonshiners, en' they met me one evenin', whenst I'se a-crossin' Diffikil branch, en' offered me a new dress to show the way to ole Tim Skinner's"

"Did you do it?" and again that sharp glance went off on its perpetual search for secret danger.

"Do it?" she retorted scornfully. "Do you think I'd tell of anybody?"

"Perhaps you didn't know?"

"But I did know," she triumphantly asserted. "I knew jest' where the 'still' was, en' I knew they were a-goin' off that night with a load, but I'd die befo' I'd tell of 'em."

"Are you as brave as that, Miriam?" The modulated tone became earnest and anxious; his gaze rested on her fine, glowing face a full minute before it traveled away upon its tireless hunt of something or some one never absent an instant from his mind. "Could you, at the peril of your life, save men tracked like wild beasts?"

"If 'twur father, now, I'd like to see 'em catch him while I'm about, onliest father don't have no mo' to do with the free stills. When he did, I kep' him safe, en' give him the signal if ever a stranger prowled the ridge," returned Miriam; "but you ain't no moonshiner?"

"No, Miriam, not a moonshiner; but would you stand by me in that way, my girl, and care what became of a stranger"——

"You have been on the ridge six months or better—you are not a stranger," she interrupted.

"No; not a stranger as these people see it," was the half ironical reply. "But, Miriam, would you care enough to marry me? I mean to stay here in the mountains all my life—spend my days in these pines where no one will ever see me. Does it matter to you that I don't want any one to see or know of me?"

A more vigilant apprehension gathered under the intensified suspense. She had hesitated and averted her face. The crystal surface of the water at her feet reflected the superb grace and manly beauty of this stranger, so unspeakably different from the rugged sun hardened habitants of ridge and hollow. The girl turned slowly toward him.

"I know yot've got sommut to hide from," she said quietly; "but for all that, Dr. Heathe, you're better than I am—you're quality breed, and I am only the old moonshiner's daughter"——

"Hush, Mariam! What does it matter what I was?" he broke in passionately. "You're too good for me. Only say that you will marry me and care for me, scoundrel that I am," added the man bitterly.

A dauntless resolution depicted itself upon Miriam's countenance, as she lifted her lustrous eyes and held his shifting glances by the subtle force and fire in their depths.

"Yes, I'll marry you, en' stand by you, too—stand by you en' help you—true en' faithful, if I am onliest a moonshiner's daughter, I'll say it en' promise it, ef so be you're true en' faithful to me,"

The harrassed tenison of Heathe's countenance relaxed.

"You have bound yourself to stand by me and love me. I'll hold you to it."

"I want you to hold me to it, onliest I want you to do the same by me," she replied.

Relinquishing his gun for a moment, he drew her into his arms and kissed her tenderly, then, with a guilty start and involuntary glance around him, released the girl and took up his weapon.

"I'm a scoundrel to ask it," he said, with a forced, angry laugh, ignoring the amending request.

"Mirry! Mirry! called a shrill voice from the house.

"Oh, me! That's grandmother! She'll be after me in a minute!" and Miriam hurried off up the path. Heathe followed, easily keeping apace with her rapid steps.

"Miriam, shall I inform Ab and your grandmother?" he asked. "You'll marry me when there's a preacher comes to—Odds Corner, don't you call it?"

"Yes; the preacher can come here. Father don't talk. en' grandmother don't go nowhere, Miriam replied, intuitively divining a reservation of doubt and caution under the phrasing of his question.

"Ab can hold his tongue, and there is no one here who cares to hear of me," he remarked, reflectively. "Ab is shy of strangers-"

The girl laughed.

"You need never fault father for talkin' to strangers: You haven't promised, though, to do good en' faithful by me"—But her lover had opened the door, and both went in.

"Mirry kin tie ter whomst she pleases," her father said when Heathe, taking advantage of Miriam's absence in the shed, told him of his hopes. "Hit's a good leetle gal as you'll git, en she's a smart gal, Mirry is—h'ain't afeered o' nothin'. She'll stick ter you, spite o' ole Nick hisself, less'n you go back on her; 'twouldn't be overly safe fur you then," and Ab chuckled, while the great quid of tobacco oscillated in his cheek.

"She says that she will, and I suppose there are people who are true and can be trusted, though I have never had the good fortune to meet them," replied the stranger, a bitter smile flitting over his countenance.

"Jes' so; they be skurce, en' pow'ful good ter come across w'en a shurf en' pack o' Guv'menters kem at yo' els. The gal knows h'it—Mirry knows, she do.

"You hev' mo' larnin' than we-uns, doctor. You mebbe wa'n't fotched up like we-uns, en' I'm a-gwine ter say es you mought think yo'sef better'n me en' Mirry"——

"Miriam is better than I am—that is what I think—and you have been my best friend," interrupted Heathe, speaking hurriedly, a hot impatience, almost desperation, in his manner. Old Abe looked pleased.

"Then you won't be 'shamed 'o Mirry ur me, whenst you' luck tu'ns, en' you h'ain't 'bleeged ter hug ter the mountings?"

"You are my only friends. There is no turn of luck can help me, no change whatever that I might wish to quit the mountains" was the deliberate assurance.

"Hit's all right, then. I' h'ain't much tried in my mind long o' whur you be foolin'ur no. Mirry's ekil to that ar; h'it's her lookout."

Abner relapsed into his moody enjoyment of the huge crackling blaze. Grandmother Sagsby came in, and soon dozed over her knitting. Miriam sat on the hearth opposite Heathe. The firelight glowed over her beautiful face and the strong, shapely figure. Utter repose and the delightful warmth conduced to that half drowsy haziness and abandon of perfect rest. The one exception was the stranger. Apparently he never rested. The watchful, listening, wide awake look seemed never beguiled away by any charm whatsoever. Two or three dogs that slept on the floor near Ab became somewhat restless. An old hound opened his eyes, and pushed himself nearer the door. The movement was slight and noiseless, but Miriam sat up and noted the animal for an instant, then left her seat and stepped slowly past him to the shed room. The dog followed her into the chilly starlight beyond. Then she stopped short and observed the hound. Lifting his nose high, he sniffed suspiciously and gave a low growl.

"What is it, Miriam?"

The girl started. Heathe was beside her, an agony of apprehension in his countenance even as he grasped his gun and held it ready to fire.

"Sommut strange is around. Leader never mistakes," she whispered, creeping closer to him. "Do you think they are hunting for you?"

"Yes, I know it. They are on my track at last. They are hunting for me if they are hunting for anybody, but I'll never be taken, Miriam—never!"

"Taken? no. It's not many get taken in the mountings," was the scornfull reply. "Leader'll give tongue time enough; and remember the big hollow tree back of the clearing—the rope is always there to let you down in it," she directed, in quick, low tones.

"Miriam," he whispered, "don't believe their black story of me—don't believe it. I was there—I saw it—but I didn't do it. I never intended the worst. I can't prove my innocence; but I solemnly tell you, I am innocent of the worst—the very worst you will hear."

Miriam laid her hand gently on his arm—her face grew tender—her voice soft and tremulous.

"I care for you John, whether it were true or not. Go—now; Leader sniffs lower—quite there. Leader—sommut's closer!"

The girl's startled, suppressed voice became suddenly shrill in its terror. Heath sprang forward with an agile, chamois like bound and vanished in the pines. The dogs inside the cabin as well as out set up a simultaneous howl. There was no doubt of an alien presence close at hand. Miriam rushed into the house and fastened the door behind her.

"We know he's in there!" shouted a rough voice.

"He's there! Give him up! We're a goin' to have him!" chorused rougher voices.

"Hit's better ter let 'em come, Mirry. He's done swung hisse'f in 'gainst now."

"Ab unbarred the door, and, opening it stepped on the threshold in cool contemplation of the scene. Instantly a revolver was on each side of his gray head.

"What be you after, shurf?" he asked, thrusting him aside. The men outside rushed rudely past him.

"You might as well give him up, Ab," answered the sheriff; "they've tracked him out here, 'en it's 'gainst the law ter shulter a crim'nal. I don't want 'er rest a neighbor. The feller goes by the name of Heathe."

"We've got to search the premises, sheriff," bristled a ferret faced man, more than usually energetic in his efforts.

The sheriff smiled significantly.

"Ef you kin sarch these 'ere premises, why jes' go ahead, Mr. Paxton—course, sir," he dryly responded.

"I've followed this Heath for a year, and I won't be beat now. There's a reward out for him—dead or alive—so you may as well tell where he is."

The man Paxton turned sharply upon Miriam as he spoke.

"Heathe is not his name neither, miss, and I'll make it worth your while to tell on him."

Miriam heard him in silence, a set, resolute expression upon her face.

"You shall have part of the reward"—

"I don't touch blood money!" she interrupted fiercely.

"It don't matter. I'll catch him yet. He's a cold blooded villian—wanted for murder."

"Murder?"

The girl shivered. Her face paled into a whiteness Ab had never seen blanch its deep, healthy hues.

"Murdered an old man for his money. They're sure to lynch him if they get hands on him. Murder and robbery. I'm certain to nab him sooner or later," added the detective, with the professional gusto of a man who had bagged human game.

Miriam listened wearily while they told the terrible tale to Ab. She watched her father narrowly. The quasi moonshiner might condone offenses against the revenue but murder!—she knew that he had a superstitious horror of a man with blood on his hands.

"He h'ain't fitten ter git off, Mirry," he whispered, while the search went on in the angry thoroughness of threatened discomfiture. "He'll fotch us turrible luck, ef he's done h'it, en'; Mirry, he shan't hev you, noways. We'll git inter trouble long o'him ef we don't tell."

"Father, I've helped en' stood by you, hev'n't I?" asked the girl, a passionate pleading in every lineament and accent.

"True 'nuff, Mirry; you've helped me pow'ful: but 'twur never murder," he rejoined, uneasily. "H'it's no good a-hopin' murder."

"No, no! I wouldn't do it neither; but he says he is innocent, father."

"Innercent? Mayhap he is, en' likely he hain;t likely he's jes' a-foolin' wid you, kase he's sartin, you'll help him out'n his trouble," shrewdly interposed Ab.

"Father, he says he didn't murder—he says so," she repeated; "en' don't you tu'n against us."

"Us? He sha'n't hev you."

The girl clung to him desperate, terror stricken violence.

"No, I won't never go with him 'till you give the say so, father," she promised, recklessly. "But he didn't do it—he is innocent, en I'll hold to him till it comes all right."

Ab turned away—his wrinkled countenance had grown hard and stern in aspect. He wished he had heard it all before they told Miriam, or before they had come into the house and the girl had reminded him of the time when her vigilance and devotion had stood him in good stead while "Guv'menters" hunted for the free distillery.

Angry and disappointed of the gains for which they served justice, the detectives came in from their futile search. They had found the two or three brush thatched outhouses an infinitesimal shred of the "premises," compared with the black ravine, the dense thickets, the great pine forest stretching away into untold labyrinths.

"See here, old man," threatened the ferret faced detective, "you'd do well to tell the truth. We're sure the fellow is here, and we're a-goin' to stay till we catch him, so you might as well own up at once."

"Dunno but I might," acknowledged Ab.

"Heathe was here to-day, wasn't he?" questioned the man, in boiling exasperation.

"Jes' so, capting; he wur here terday."

"Thought so. Gim'me the truth, now. He's here now, ain't he?"

Ab tore off a long leaf of tobacco from a home grown twist and held it in tempting proximity to his mouth.

"Nat'ral 'nuff, capting, ef he hain't guv you the slip he be heah yit."

"Confound the fellow, we might a-known by their takin' it so cool that he had vamosed; curse the whole business!" angrily retorted Paxton; but Ab had stowed the tobacco leaf safely into his mouth and lazily dropped into a chair before the fire.

His talk was over for the time.

The lukewarm sheriff and enraged detectives had taken themselves off, down the ridge, some time before Ab said, with a satisfied chuckle.

"Twan't no lie es I tole 'em, Mirry. I knowed them pow'ful sharp fellers wouldn't believe h'it; but mind you, gal, you hain't got my say so ter tek' no man commits murder, en' you'll never git h'it, kase he don't mean you right, en' h'it's onlucky.

The girl knew her father too well to remonstrate. She knew, too, that Heathe was only safe while she adhered to her promise not to marry him without Ab's permission. The cold winter tightened its grip, and still an uneasy sense of surveillance and danger hung over them. The old moonshiner's family had once been full of expedients for deluding doubtful visitors. They seemed to come back to Miriam, along with thousands of ingenious devices for the comfort and safety of her lover. All the winter long he was neither seen nor heard of at Ab's cabin, but all the winter long neither rain, nor snow, nor raging tempest—the tempest of the mountains—prevented the girl's daily pilgrimage to the hut in the black ravine. Ab would watch her go out in the whirling snow wreaths, with the basket on her arm, but he never questioned her errand. So the winter dragged its ice cold lengths away. The fine frosty flakes of snow betokened a fierce storm coming over the ridge—already it had sifted like white powder into crack and crevice, shutting out the rigid wind roaring savagely among the pines outside, but passing almost contemptuously the warm, substantial cabin crouching beneath them. The snow deadened all sounds without, the dogs gave no howl nor warning, when suddenly the door was thrown open, and with the sweeping gust and snow two men came in. They were the sheriff and a stranger.

"Don't make no stir, Ab!" shouted the sheriff. "It's all right—t'other feller's confessed. Heathe didn't do it. This here's his brother—t'other feller owned up when he's a-dyin'."

Ab smiled grimly.

"I wouldn't hev tuk nobody's wu'd for h'it but youa'n, shurf."

"Yes; we've kem a-puppose ter get him, tho' it's cold es blazes," added the satisfied sheriff, "You see Heathe kem in on 'em, en' folks knowed thar's bad blood 'twixt 'em so they pitched oh him, en' wouldn't believe nothin' else. 'Twur a clear case 'gainst him; but he's innocent, and me'n his brother kem for him. Hes' all right now."

"Fotch him, Mirry—hi 't's my say so."

"You had a close call, young man; they'd hev hanged you sure, if they'd caught you," the sheriff said, an hour later, when explanations had been made, and Heathe stood among them, beside his brother, free and innocent.

"I must have had an inevitable and final call this terrible winter but for this true and loving woman," answered Heath, as he looked down into Miriam's lustrous eyes and beautiful face, softened and aglow with joyous tenderness. "And now, Ab, there is nothing to hinder—we will be married to-morrow." And they were.—Inde in Frank Leslie's.

Another Story of Gen. Sheridan.

"It was only last winter that I met Gen. Sheridan," said Col. Mosby to the San Francisco Post's Town-Talker, "and I met him at Senator Stanford's house in Washington. I had gone there to call upon Mrs. Grant, and the Sheridans were calling upon the senator that evening. I met Mrs. Sheridan in the drawing-room, and when I was introduced to her I laughingly remarked: 'I once tried very hard to deprive you of your husband, Mrs. Sheridan.' Mrs. Sheridan replied: 'Now, I do not think I ought to be pleased to meet you, then.' 'Well,' I answered, you, must remember that your husband tried very hard to deprive my wife of her husband. The general was not in the room at the time, but was with the senator in the smoking-room. Toward the end of the evening Mrs Stanford took me into the smoking-room and introduced me to Gen. Sheridan. I found him a very agreeable companion, and I have always regretted the fact that I had not seen more of him. We were opposed to each other in the war, and Gen. Sheridan had made it his boast that he would drive me out of Virginia, and I was equally as determined to stay. He was a gallant soldier and gentleman, and I feel very blue about his illness. He was the foremost soldier of his day, and it will be too bad if he is carried off at this early age. He is a young man yet, but it seems to me that there are very few of the old veterans being left now. The day is fast approaching for all of us to leave this earth." And Col. Mosby stepped well into the street and took a look at the roof of the army headquarters, which are located in the Phelan building. "Thank God," he said, "he has not passed away yet."

A Snake Which Killed Heifers.

A number of young cattle belonging to Frederick Gress of Tod township Pa., came home from pasture one evening. Gress noticed a foreleg of one of the cattle was badly swollen. The next morning the animals leg was three times its natural size from hip to shoulder, and the body was also swollen. The animal, a valuable young heifer, lay on the ground moaning in pain, its eyes being red with blood, and froth dropping from its mouth. It died in a short time. The next evening another one of the herd exhibited the same symptoms, and died in the same way. A third heifer died with the mysterious ailment a day later There are many rattlesnakes in the locality, and the general opinion was that the cattle had been bitten by these venomous reptiles and died from the effects of the poison, although no previous cases of the kind were known thereabout. A snake about three feet long of a dark brown color, and with a spur like protuberance on its tail, was killed where the cattle had been pasturing. A couple of rattlesnakes were also killed in the same place. The horned snake is an entirely new species in this region, and the farmers of Tod township believe that it was responsible for the death of Gress's cattle. A snake with a horn on its tail was killed a few days ago near this place, on John S. Wilson's farm, by a neighbor, who was helping him haul stone off the field.

What the Czar Reads.

In the library are a large collection of books and magazines, most of them on technical subjects, the English, French, German and Russian language being represented. I saw Longfellow's and Whittier's poems, several of Howell's novels which looked familiar, and the Edinburg print of Frank Stockton's "Lady and the Tiger." This, I was told, was the favorite story of the Czar, and Minister Lathrop afterward informed me that "The Casting Away of Mrs. Aylshire and Mrs Lecks" has been read with absorbing interest not only by the family of the Czar but by all the court, and the remarkable adventures of those ladies was the theme of much conversation at dinner parties and other gatherings in Russia. —[W. E PLURIBUS UNUM.

"HILLBOURNE PLACE, Feb. 7.

"Dear Jack—The fur coat is a pronounced success. I saw you to-day when I was driving, and was forcibly reminded of Solomon in his glory. Have you forgotten your friends of old in their clothes also ofold? One would think so, as it's been ten days since you were here.

"The rest of the family are going to the Porters tonight, but I shall stay at home and console myself with Beethoven, Sidney Lanier and you, if you'll come, for I have something to show you. A woman's head, painted from a photograph, which I finished only yesterday. It isn't bad.

Affectionately, CARA."

"THE CLUB, Feb. 7, '86.

"Dear Cara—Yours just received. It seems almost unnecessary to tell you how glad I shall be to come. Devotedly, JACK."

"It isn't" says Cara a few hours later, as she pushed the ottoman to an easier distance, and turns a beautiful, fire-flushed face toward Jack, "it isn't that this winter has been much worse than the other two, but I've been thinking, and as its a luxury I don't often allow myself, I have mental dyspepsia as a result."

"Mental dyspepsia!" says Jack scornfully; "it's the result of setting out all the square dances with Willoughby in that draughty conservatory of the Marstons.

"I refuse to understand," says Cara, smilling.

"You can't! Your intellect," won't allow you.

"Speaking of intellect," viciously, "somehow makes me think of your friend, Miss Marston. How is she?"

"I don't know why it should. She's well."

"Do you intend to please your father and marry her?"

"I don't know, Cara. If the worst, comes to the worst, I suppose I shall have to."

"I should think that would be an exact statement of the case—the worst coming to the worst."

"Don't be any more severe than you can help," says Jack, laughing. "You don't know what it is to be poor."

"I almost wish I did." Cara answers; "I might then have amounted to something as an artist."

"You need hardly wish that, for, as it is, you are the best amateur."

"That's it" Cara breaks in impatiently. "Amateur, amateur, always amateur! I want to be an artist. Of late I have had thoughts of giving my money to found a home for other weakminded women, and living in Paris on ten sous a day and the divine afflatus; only as Hawthorne says: 'The great obstacle to being heroic is the doubt whether one may not be going to prove one's self a fool.'"

"One doesn't like to be too precipitate after a remark of that kind," says Jack, meditatively, after a little pause, during which Cara has risen and seated herself at the piano, where she is lazily striking minor chords.

"Is that what has kept you from being too precipitate? Jack, what makes you so lazy?"

"Lack of incentive. Don't scorn."

"I wish I could make you feel your possibilities for yourself as I feel them for you."

"I asked you to try once, and you refused." Jack laughs when he says it, but try as he will his voice falters when he speaks.

Cara blushes, and then says: "If we hadn't outlived a great deal of the nonsense of our lives, we could not be the thoroughly good friends we are now. Come and let me introduce you to a woman who, I think, is worth a man's love. She's over in the library. I remember your dislike to climbing, and had her brought down."

Jack offers her his arm, and together they walk the whole length of the drawing-room, across the hall to the library, the greater part of which is in shadow, the one bright light directly over the picture.

Only a picture of a woman's head and the curve to the shoulders; ruddy chestnut hair that curls mistily around a face in which sweetness and firmness are strangely intermingled, great irised gray eyes, eyes with all the poetry and passion of Cabanel's Venus; a clear, almost delicately colorless skin, save from a warmth in mouth and cheek; and yet, with all the yielding beauty of womanhood, there is an intellectual vigor and strength in the face which one seldom sees save in the faces of men who have suffered and been strong."

"It is by far the best thing you have ever done," says Jack, after a few moments of admiring silence. "May I see the photograph?"

"It's behind the Mona Lisa, not a very good one. It must have been done by some amateur photographer, judging from the finish. But, Cara, how much the eyes here are ike your own!"

"They tell me so. Ah! Jack, I regret to see that you are regarding her more as a woman than as an artistic production.

"I'm afraid I am. Do you know her well? Why have I never seen her?

"Now," says Cara, "you have made me jealous, and, like a wise woman, I refuse to talk of my rival. On Thursday night the five members of our art class are coming with Herr Blum to my box to hear Bernhardt. We will come to a little supper; you will sing us some Schubert; Eugenie will play us the "Apassionata;" you will meet your ideal; we will persuade ourselves that 'every loss has a gain to match,' and forget"—"how miserable we shall feel in the morning," Jack finished for her.

"Pessimist!" says Cara, smiling; "will you come?"

"Do I ever refuse an invitation from you?" as he rises preparatory to taking his leave.

"Then it is settled. If you care to you may take the photograph with you."

"Thank you," he says, slipping it into the pocket of his great coat.

"Now I am going back to the bread and butter part of existence. There's something almost dreary in the persistence with which one and one are two, isn't there?"

"There have been cases"—what a coquette the girl is!—"there have been cases where one and one made one."

He had taken her hand to say good-night as she speaks, and a passionate light comes into his eyes at her words. "Ah, Cara," he says impulsively. "I only thought—"

"Don't think," she answers, "consult the proper mathematical authorities."

On Thursday night Jack, having made a very careful toilet and mislaid everything with a cheerful sense of the entire responsibility of Betty, the chambermaid, takes a last look at the photograph which occupies the place of honor over his dressing-case, before setting out to meet the original. "Something will probably have happened to keep her at home, or something," he soliloquizes as he leaves the house.

It is the middle of the first act when he reaches the box. Cara smiles as he enters. The rest of the party are completely absorbed, but he can see that she is there. Her back is toward him, but surely only one woman could have hair like that, and wear black lace the way she does. Jack suddenly remembers his ideal costume for a woman has always been made of black lace.

And Cara? Well, Cara is a very beautiful woman, but then she could never give much love to any one, and what emotional gymnastics she would require of the man to whom she was married.

As the curtain falls the orchestra begins "Weber's Last," and Cara motions him toward her. "Eugenie," she says, leaning forward, "Eugenie, let me present my friend—" Jack doesn't hear the rest, for the lady turns and he sees a fascinatingly ugly woman, with a delightful directness of gaze, who acknowledges the introduction in the middle of a remark which she is making to the Lieut. Willoughby. Jack glances appealingly at Cara, who is rather suspiciously engaged in a leisurely survey of the house through her glasses.

"There's Mrs. Dunbar," says Cara's aunt, leaning forward for a better view. "She has succeeded in engaging her daughter in the army."

"Did I hear you say," laughs Cara, "that her dearest wish is accomplished?"

"No," says Mrs. Lorrimer. "One doesn't say those things my dear."

"Let us consider, then," says Cara, demurely; "that no one has spoken."

"I have been having something of that sensation all the evening," says the lieutenant. "Bernhardt's French must be provincial; I can't understand her."

There is a little laugh in the midst of which Jack pauses abruptly; for in M'lle Le Croix's face, as she smiles, he suddenly sees, almost ghostlike, an expression of the photograph. It is gone before he can be certain, and she has turned from him to Mrs. Lorrimer, who is saying plaintively: "I wish Bernhardt would play in English."

"If some one would suggest it to her" says Jack, "She would probably sit up late one night and learn the language."

"Did I ever tell you," says Eugenie. turning so that Jack again has a full view of her face, "of an experience I had when I was first learning your English? No? I was just at the point where I found for myself that you wrote one language and spoke another, when one evening I had the good fortune to meet Gen. Lawson. You know his reputation as a conversationalist, and I wished to convey to him an idea of the pleasure which I felt at meeting him, so I said impressively in broken English, 'I am glad to meet you, general, as I am making a special study of American idiots.' His composure was superb. He never faltered for a moment. His face had all the calm of one eternal Sabbath, as he answered, suavely: 'This is the only time in life, mademoiselle, when I feel that I can fully justify a prejudged opinion.'"

Jack had watched her while she speaks, and again sees the subtle something that reminds him of the picture. A curve to the cheek, an indefinite something surely suggests it to him, and yet, as Cara sat listening with a half smile on her lips, she might herself have been the theme of which the painting was the finished harmony.

"If this thing keeps up." said Jack, my mind will be a mosaic. I shall speak to Cara about it when I get an opportunity." But he doesn't get an opportunity, but just then Cara announces, "Ah! there is Helen now, Eugenie, and our cousin is with her."

He takes a long breath and feels himself a sane man again. Here, at last, is a solution of the problem. A mutual cousin is the original; nothing more likely. He returns Cara's glance in a manner which intimates that he understands the situation at last, and awaits with interest the entrance of the two ladies. There is a little rustle just outside the box, a man's voice heard in a tone of remonstrance, a woman's low and self contained, and the lady herself stands at the door of the box. A woman in the prime of life, with that repose of manner which comes after one has found that things are neither white nor black, but only neutral tint, and has ceased expecting much, one whose social angles have been rounded into curves, and who is seldom found holding those unsatisfactory opinions which we denominate "opposite."

"Mrs. Carter," says Cara.

"Delighted," murmers Jack.

"Helen will be here in a few minutes. She stopped at the Marstons' box to settle about some engagement with them. Dick will bring her over here."

"She seems to have a great many engagements with them of late," says Miss Le Croix.

"Only one—with Dick—I think," laughs Mrs. Carter.

"Bless their innocent hearts, these children! They think I don't see."

"You have missed the best act of the play on account of that 'At Home,'" says Cara.

"I know it," the lady responded. "I am a martyr to my friends, but Herr Blum said something almost witty, and that consoled me. He says," she continues, turning to Jack, "that Bernhardt's full face looks like a profile."

"It was Heine who said it first," says Herr Blum.

"He always attributes everything he says to some one else. It relieves him of so much responsibility," Mrs. Carter explains amiably to Jack. And, as she does so, with a smilling, strong restful face, Jack grasps nervously at the chair on which he sits, as if to steady himself, for, incongruous and inexplicable as it may seem, she also reminds him of that picture. Not in the lines of the face, certainly, but rather in its entirety, its strength, its repose, its—

"Well, the worst has come," thinks he, rising with determination. "While the last faint spark of intelligence remains I will make my way home. If I don't go soon I will have to be taken."

"You are not going?" says Cara. "Not before Helen comes, anyhow. See! she is here now."

Jack takes one look at the girl who enters, and turning to Cara says:

"My dear girl, I am losing either my brains or my eyesight."

"It must be your eyesight," laughs Cara.

"Oh!" says Jack, desperately; "you don't understand. I see resemblances to that pictured face in sections everywhere. In you, in Miss LeCroix, in this Helen, and just now I notice that even Herr Blum looks a little like it."

"You have the photograph on your brain," answers Cara, so that Eugenie hears.

"Speaking of photographs" says she, "makes me think of a new theory of Herr Blum. He thinks if we could get a composite photograph of people's brains, as we can of their faces, it would be an easy way of getting the average intelligence."

"A composite photograph!" Jack caught at the phrase with frank hope. "A composite photograph is—"

"A composite photograph," echoes the professor, settling himself to be instructive, "is obtained by exposing different photographs of the same size, for the same time, on the same sensitized plate. These ladies were taken in this way recently, and it made a beautiful face. How could it do other?" he added, simply enough.

"Apropos of your explanation, professor," says Jack, "I have a story to tell of a friend of mine who was the victim of an unparalled hoax."

"Mrs. ——," said Cara rising, "is beckoning to me, and I thing I shall go and speak to her for a minute, if you'll excuse me. Will you come, lieutenant?"

"You had better stay and defend yourself," says Jack, "for I'm going to tell."

"I shall need no defence here. I am sure," she says, laughing softly. "Au revoir!"

Three weeks after, as Jack and Cara stand before the newly-framed picture, he says: "It was rather shabby of you to do it, but I forgive you, and am just as much in love with it as ever."

"That's discouraging," says Cara. "You can't marry them all."

"Unfortunately, no. Utah is remote. I might do it in turn. Who sat first?"

"I refuse to tell you," says Cara; but colors slightly as she speaks.

"Your eyes have told me already," he answers, and there, for a minute, they regard each other steadily. She has so much and he has so little! She has refused him once before, and yet—of late, he has almost dared to hope—

"Do you think, Cara—that you ever could love—" His eyes finished the sentence for him, and he reached his hands toward her with infinite longing.

"I think," she says, smiling a little as she lays her hands in his, "that I might—if I were sufficiently urged." And then, with one of those passionate veerings which he knows so well: "I think I have always loved you, Jack."

Ten days later she receives a note, over which she smiles, as it has been but a few hours since he has left her:

"To Mrs. Jack Hannaford (that will be):

"When did you say that you would help form that composite which will make you Madame Me? I want to see a statement of the fact in your own writing Yours, JACK."

To which she answers:

"You spoke of next month when you were here. Let it be on the 12th. With all my love and sympathy for the terrible future before you,

"Lovingly, CARA."

Something About Honiton Lace.

Saturday Review.

Honiton lace has a curious chequered history with many fluctuations. It is said to have been first introduced by the Flemings, who took refuge in England to escape the persecutions of the Duke of Alva. Many Flemish names are still to be found in the neighborhood of Honiton—namely, Stocker, Murch, Maynard, Trump, etc. In 1660 there was such a demand for it that France thought it necessary to issue a royal ordinance providing that a mark should be affixed to imported English thread lace. Two great fires at Honiton in 1756 and 1767 gave the first great check to its production. Queen Adelaide tried to revive it after twenty years of severe depression by ordering a skirt, made of sprigs, copies of natural flowers, commencing with the initials of her name; for a very debased and hideous set of patterns had come in. This does not seem to have produced a great revival of the trade, and when our present queen required her wedding lace, it was found difficult to provide the workers; but eventually a dress worth £1,000 was made at the small fishing village of Beer. The English royal family have been most constant patrons of Honiton lace, and have done immense good in keeping the trade alive. We will end by quoting a few quaint words from Fuller's Devonshire worthies, which sum up the plea for the revival: "Hereby many children who otherwise would be burthensome to the parish prove benificial to their parents. Yes, many lame in their limbs, and impotent in their arms, if able in their fingers, gain a livelihood thereby; not to say that it saveth many thousands of pounds yearly, formerly sent over seas to fetch lace in Flanders."

The old-time controversy has broken out in Canada over the question whether Dominion militiamen may consistently visit a Yankee city on the Fourth of July and take in the patriotic celebration of the holiday. The argument urged by the remonstrants is, that a jubilation over a defiance of Great Britain must be distasteful to men loyal to the crown.

An extraordinary experiment was made at Bone, in Algeria, on May 29, after the execution of a native who had murdered his brother and the latter's wife and father-in-law. As the head fell from the guillotine a doctor took it up and spoke a few words. Various movements of the man's eyes and mouth seemed to show that his words had been heard and understood.

Poison for some animals is food for others. Hogs can eat henbane or hyocyamus, which is fatal to dogs and most other animals. Dogs and horses are not easily poisoned with arsenic. Goats eat water hemlock with impunity; pheasants, stramonium; rabbits, belladonna; and morphia is said to be innocuous to pigeons. There is some truth in the old saying that "what is one man's meat is another man's poison." This is due to habits and idiosyncracies.

A few days ago the Treasury Department received from Brooklyn the half of a $20 note and an affidavit made by Mrs. Ann Ennis, of that city, in which she swore that the other half had been chewed up by her child. The next day the Treasury Department received an affidavit from John Shea, of New York, which also contained half of a $20 Treasury note, which he desired to have redeemed. Shea's affidavit stated that the bill had been torn in half accidently, and that he had lost the other half. This half bore the same number as the half which had been received from Mrs. Ennis the day before. The two halves were laid together, and it was found that the torn edges matched exactly.

George Smart, while assisting a drayman to remove an unfinished marble tombstone at Grand Forks, fell from the dray, the slab, weighing about 600 pounds, falling upon him. A fractured collar bone and serious internal injuries resulted.

At Stillwater, Minn., as Will Hursey was preparing to pump out the contents of a big tank containing over 6,000 gallons of Kerosene, something went wrong with the valve, and, before the difficulty could be remedied, over 3,000 gallons of oil ran out and swept down the railroad track. Of course the loss is complete.

A nine-year-old daughter of Amos Giles of Little Falls, Minn., found a railroad torpedo near the Northern Pacific track and exploded it by pounding it with a piece of iron. The base of the torpedo entered her forehead, making a fearful gash and cutting her brain and dashing a part of it out upon a fence near by. The child cannot recover.

New Jersey was visited by a severe wind and rain storm. Great damage was done to crops and buildings. The Pennsylvania railroad round house at Millstone Junction was blown down. James Barry, Hugh Garrigan and John White, three ball players who were taking shelter from the storm, were buried in the ruins and badly crushed. A barn on George Plumleys farm near Middleburgh was also blown down. Plumley is reported killed.

While a train was moving up hill from Butte, Montana, the cars became uncoupled from the engine and dashed down the grade, jumping the track and killing two boys, named respectively Greene and Burns of Centerville, and injuring two brakemen whose names are not known, but who are not seriously hurt. The whole force of the company has been engaged cleaning the debris off the track.

Three well known persons were drowned at Lake Johanna, a small body of water about seven miles from St. Paul. The victims were Harry M. Tucker, the popular night clerk of the Hotel Ryan, his aged father from New York, and Mrs. Mary Dysinger, wife of Stephen Dysinger, who is employed as bookkeeper by L. L. May & Co. It was at a picnic party, and the capsizing of a boat was the cause of the melancholy accident.

A devastating cyclone swept upon a number of towns along the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road. It is impossible to estimate the amount of damage done. The extent of the territory over which the storm swept was about 100 miles in length and nearly a mile in width. Many horses and cattle were either killed by lightning or from the effect of the wind. At Ruthven an agricultural implement house was wrecked. Trapp Bros.' livery barn, the Kirkwood hotel, the Methodist Episcopal church and Tom Gift's dwelling were all leveled to the ground. Many residences were damaged and barns and outbuildings are scattered over the prairies. The farming country around Whitemore and Ruthven looks desolate. The corn which looked promising, is shorn to the ground and other grain is badly damaged.

A grip car beyond control and running at the rate of eight miles per hour through the business part of Chicago caused a lively scene. The result was three badly wrecked cars, many badly-frightened women and children and some severe contusions, but no fatilities. As a Clark street car came out of the tunnel on La Salle going south the driver made an attempt to apply the brakes, but without effect, as a strand of cable had wound itself around the grip and the car was moving at a dangerous speed. Just ahead of this was a Wells street train filled with passengers. At Monroe street the Wells street train was struck and thrown in a heap into the gutter. Two Blocks further on the flying train struck the curve at Dearborn street. The car became disengaged from the strand and ended its career by jumping the track. Loss about $10,000.

A sensation has been created by the disappearance of Banker C. C. Nelson, of Atlanta, Georgia. When his bookkeeper opened the safe he found it empty, and no trace of his employer. It has since transpired that Nelson left on the Western & Atlantic northbound train, and took with him a heavy valise, presumably filled with valuables, roughly estimated at $15,000.

Constable Wood of Fargo D. T. arrested and took before the insanity board one Goodrow, on suspicion of insanity, the man having told a story which he repeated to the board to the effect that he had, about three years ago, killed a man residing at or near Haywood, Wis., by shooting him through the head. He further stated that the man before he died gave him some money. There is no question but the man is insane, and this story is regarded as imaginary.

While the fourth of July was being celebrated at Gueda Springs, Kansas, it was ascertained that Ike David, Jim Cherry and one Simmons, all colored from Arkansas City, had opened a whiskey stand in a corn field near by. Mayor L. C. Kenyon and Justice of the Peace Furry went out to put an end to the proceedings, when Cherry shot the former through the bowels, wounding him fatally, and the latter through the leg. After this the two swam the Arkansas river and are now in Indian Territory.

Samuel M. Henderson shot and killed his divorced wife, Sarah Henderson, and then killed himself at Trafalgar, Ind., Mrs. Henderson obtained a divorce last September. Henderson went to Illinois where he was arraigned before the United States court for sending the divorced woman obscene letters through the mail. A family of grown children survive their parents.

In the town o Wanger, Marshall county, Minn., a horrible tragedy has occurred. A farmer, Joseph Tomowoski, went out with his nephew to cut some timber. Several days afterward Mr. Tomowoski was found dead in a slough near the place where he had been cutting timber with a ghastly gun shot wound in his neck. The nephew says he brought a shotgun with him, and when he and his uncle had commenced cutting wood he placed the gun by a tree. After a while a big man came along and disputed Mr. Tomowoski's right to cut the timber. A fight ensued, and the nephew ran away, and as he was running heard the report of a gun. The nephew told the neighbors, and search was made and the body found as above stated.

Louis J. Finlay, a furniture worker of Milwaukee is charged with attempting to poison his wife. One night Mrs. Finlay awoke in the middle of the night to find her husband holding a vial to her mouth. "Take a drink, darling," he said, when he saw she was awake. There was a strong odor of chloform, and her clothing was saturated with it. She went to a neighbor's, and at once communicated with her parents at Oshkosh, Wis., from whom she ascertained that her husband had written them several days before that she was dangerously ill. These circumstances, in connection with the fact that she had felt unwell after drinking a cup of coffee prepared for her by him, led her to cause his arrest. He at first admitted and then denied the charge. His marriage occurred less than a year ago, and it is supposed he wanted to get rid of his wife to marry another woman. Four years ago a former wife and child were burned to death in their dwelling at Grand Rapids, Mich.

At a picnic given by the trades and labor assembly at the fair grounds at St. Joseph, Mo., the Brotherhood men attempted to run Golden Holman, a Chicago, Burlington & Quincy engineer, from the grounds. Harrigan will probably die.

The Indians of the Leech Lake reservation are already starting south for the blueberry picking. It has been understood that Agent Sheehan would not permit them to leave the reservations, or would make an effort to prevent it, owing to the agitation against the Indians on account of so many prosecutions for liquor selling to them. There is much bitterness and some danger of acts of violence if previous conduct is repeated; and if, as is usual liquor is sold them.

They were not permitted to enter the cell department of the prison, that being contrary to the rules, but they held a long and earnest conversation with their son and brother through the bars. Morehouse will hear an appeal for the commutation of sentence by Brooks' attorneys, and she and her daughter will make a personal plea for young Brooks' life and present letters and documents in his behalf.

Wisconsin dedicated seven monuments on the Gettysburg battlefield. The exercises were held at Reynold's grove and within a few feet of where that general was killed. When Capt. Levi Long, president of the commission, called the gathering to order and transferred the monuments to the representative of the governor of Wisconsin, the level space before the stand was crowded with the veterans of the Wisconsin regiments. Gov. Rusk was not present, and the state treasurer, Col. H. B. Harshaw, accepted the monuments on behalf of the state. United States Senator Spooner delivered an eloquent oration. The monuments were formally presented to the Gettysburg Battle Field Memorial association by Gen. Lucius Fairchild.

Supposed Dynamiters Arrested.

Thomas Broderick and J. A. Bowles have been arrested and are in jail at Chicago, charged with conspiring to destroy the Burlington railroad company's property. They had considerable quantity of dynamite in their possession when arrested. It is stated that the Burlington company has had a large force of detectives engaged for a long time in watching the movements of the strikers. Several so-called "agitators" were put under special surveillance. It was discovered that dynamite was used in several unsuccessful attempts to wreck trains within the past month. The officials state that besides a definite plan to blow up trains upon the tracks by means of dynamite catridges the plot included the posibility of an attack upon the depot property and magnificent office building at Chicago.

Thomas Broderick and J. A. Bowles, two brotherhood ex-engineers of the "Q" were seen to board the train in company with a man not known to the officers. A fourth man they were looking for was not identified. The strange man, who proved to be John Q. Wilson, took a double seat beside Broderick, while Bowels sat just across the aisle. The officers tapped the men on the shoulders and made them prisoners. The men had taken off their coats, and, under the two coats lying between Broderick and Wilson upon the seat, was an innocent looking package wrapped in a newspaper. It was found to contain four dynamite cartridges each about ten inches long and an inch square. These were fitted with a small fuse to each, and each contained about a pound of dynamite. In Broderick's pocket in a purse were found several small dynamite fulminating caps. The prisoners were taken before United States Commissioner Hoyne on their arrival at Chicago. The first response to the appeal for aid came in the person of J. J. Hannahan vice grand master of the Brotherhood. He professed not to know any of the prisoners. After a hasty conference with Bowles he asked the district attorney to wait until he summoned Chairman Hogs, of the old Burlington Grievance committee. This was agreed to He whispered a word to Broderick and then said to Bowles they would do all they could for them. To a reporter he said: "I don't know these men at all. If they have done anything wrong the Brotherhood wants them punished as much as anybody else, but we will investigate their case and if they have been unjustly accused we will give them all the help in our power."

THE BLUE AND GRAY.

Re-Union of the Unionists and Confederates at Gettysburg, and Some Fraternal War Talk.

Gettysburg was on Sunday the 1st, the scene of a different sort of gathering from the one assembled there just twenty-five years ago. It was a re-union of the survivors of the battle, in which the men of both sides participated.

In the evening, dress parade in the presence of 10,000 people was followed by a sacred concert by the Frankford band. Reynolds grove was a throng of humanity for an hour before the memoral exercises of the 1st army corps were called to order. During the gathering of the audience, Gen. Longstreet was escorted to the stand, and hundreds of veterans of the blue shook hands with him. Gov. Beaver and his staff and a number of confederate survivors occupied seats. Gens. Beaver and Longstreet were received with cheer. Gen. E. P. Halstead, president of the First Army Corps Association, opened the exercises and introduced Bishop Newman of Washington, who, in a fervid invocation, gave thanks for the bravery and heroism displayed here in the maintenance of constitutional liberty.

Gov. Beaver was enthusiastically received, especially by the veterans. Gen. John C. Robinson, orator of the occasion, thanked Gov. Beaver for his cordial welcome extended the first army corps veterans and complimented the Keystone state on her constant and substantial testimonials of appreciation of the soldiers. He considered this a great day for the first army corps to meet after a quarter of a century on the field made historic by their valor, and asserted with emphasis that not half has been told of the deeds of this command in this, one of the most important engagements during the entire battle; giving full credit to what others had done here, he thought it should be remembered that here the first corps held in check for six hours two-thirds of the confederate army.

George Frederick Smith, the war governor of New Hampshire, on being introduced, counted it one of the most important events of his life to be present, and after brief remarks closed with the expression that he should never cease to hold in highest regard the men who had done this great country such service as was displayed on this spot.

The confederate general, James Longstreet, was next introduced, and received hearty cheers. He said he was not on the field in time to witness the engagement between the 1st corps and the troops of the South; was glad to be present and participate in these exercises, for he saw in them the development of a sympathy such as was born in the hearts of all who know how to appreciate that feeling, and thought none knew better how to manifest these feelings than the troops of the 1st corps.

After speaking of the advantages of the federal position he said that here the southern army met its fate, but not for want of valor he said: "Picket's charge has not a parallel in the annals of war," and touchingly alluding to the dead said, "such is the same service sometimes demanded by the usages of war," glancing toward Round Top, "yon crowning heights are now far more pleasant for fraternal meetings." In closing he said: "The ladies are present, God bless them, and may they dispel all allusions that may come between the people."

The band played "Dixie" before Longstreet's speech, and "Yankee Doodle," after which Gen. Fairchild was introduced and started out with the sentence: "Twenty-five years have made it possible to sandwich a confederate and a yankee between 'Dixie' and 'Yankee Doodle.'"

He did not know a better object lesson for the young than these fraternal gatherings of those two once hostile armies. He agreed with Gov. Beaver's opening remarks concerning the use of the Sabbath for this purpose, and thought no day too holy to visit these scenes and hold memorial services over the dead. In times of war it was not too holy to fight on Sunday, and with proper motives in the heart this was not too holy a day to pay well-merited tribute to the dead.

Prof. Williams, of Providence, R. I., Prof. Estine, historian of the first corps, and several others spoke briefly.

SECOND DAY OF THE GETTYSBURG RE-UNION.

There was a strange similarity between this day (the 3rd of July) and that of twenty-five years ago. Then the armies of Meade and Lee confronted each other, So to-day the federals and confederates were once more on field and again was the one on Seminary Ridge and the other on Cemetery Hill. Nothing unusual occurred to break the monotony until the Unions and Confedrates met once more at almost the same hour at which they had joined in deadly combat twenty-five years ago. The signal corps association of the Army of the Potomac. Determined to erect an imposing tablet on Little Round Top commemorative of the work done by this branch of the army in the battle. At the conclusion of the parade Rev. Twitchell of Hartford, Conn., opened the exercises with prayer. Gen. Robinson of New York presided. The poet of the occasion, George Parsons Lathrop, was unable to be present, but part of his poem was read by Gen. Horatio C. King, secretary of the Society of the Army of the Potomac. When the orator, George William Curtis, was presented he was greeted with hearty applause. Mr. Curtis spoke as follows:

On this field we consecrate ourselves to American union. In this hallowed ground lie buried not only brave soldiers of the blue and gray, but the passions of war, the jealousies of sections and the bitter root of all our national differences—human slavery. As the fate of Christendom was determined at Tours, that of American independence at Saratoga, and that of modern Europe at Waterloo, the destiny of the American union was decided at Gettysburg. Fellow Americans, in telling any part of the story of America we seem to boast. The simple statement of the truth sounds like a fairy tale. What other civilized state stretches from ocean to ocean with such unchallenged continental dominion, with such a varied realm of natural grandeur and beauty, with so vast a population, so free, so intelligent, so industrious, so contented? Not easily nor rapidly can the passions sprung from bitter local differences and cherished and strengthened for a generation disappear. Often in hot and reckless protestation those dying emotions will break forth like the distant muttering thunder of a retiring storm. But the central fact is bright as a fixed star. The line across the Union drawn by the flaming sword of hostile, social and industrial institutions and irreconcilable theories of the nature and power of the government itself—this latent revolution and nascent civil war have disappeared forever. At the end of 100 years the Union is the sacred seamless garment of equal rights, of harmonious institutions, of accordant views of the government, in which 60,000,000 of people in thirty-eight states are harmoniously arrayed. The suffrage is the mainspring, the heart of our common life, and whatever affects it injuriously touches the national sensorium and the whole country thrills. No community politically founded upon the legal equality of the suffrage can habitually disregard that equality without moral deterioration, growing indifference to the authority of the law, and destruction of

THE DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLE.

If ignorance and semi-barbarous dominance be fatal to civilized communities, not less so is constant and deliberate defiance of law. In a national union of states, where fair elections are assumed, systematic fraud or violence or oppression of votes, in the event of a closely contested poll, would inevitably destroy the conviction that the apparent result would be challenged amid disorder. It is not enough that a national election be fair; it must be the national conviction that it is fair. The citizens of this magnificent commonwealth cannot reach across the Potomac and impose their will respecting the suffrage upon the mother of states, nor can the States of New England dictate legislation to the states of the Northwest. But the Virginian knows that the Pennsylvanian is vitally interested in his action. Iowa and Wisconsin know that Maine and Rhode Island have a common stake in such local laws, and as Washington and Pinckney, Jefferson and Madison and Martin took counsel with Alexander Hamilton and Dr. Franklin and Rufus and Roger Sherman, bent upon a common purpose, but with due regard to every local condition, so will their sons confer, fraternally forbearing, until the great problem of the suffrage and all other problems are solved. Can we wrest from the angel of this hour any blessing so priceless as the common resolution that we shall not have come to the consecrated spot only to declare our joy and gratitude nor only to cherish proud and tender memories, but also to pledge ourselves to union in its sublimest significance? Here at last is its sacred secret revealed. It lies in the patriotic instinct which has brought to this field the Army of Northern Virginia and the Army of the Potomac. It lies in the manly emotion with which the generous soldier sees only the sincerity and courage of his ancient foe, and scorns succession of a lingering enmity. It lies in the perfect freedom of speech and perfect fraternity of spirit which now for three days have glowed in these heroic perils and echoed in this enchanted air.

Prefers Lightning to Hemp.

"Whad's de matter with de electricity?" The question was asked in New York by Dan Lyons, chief of the Whyo gang, an hour after he was sentenced to be hanged on July 17. Dan had read the new law abolishing the noose and substituting electrical stroke as a means of death for capital punishment. The electrical method was to be applied only to men condemned after next Jan. 1. Lyons has now asked his counsel to petition the governor for a respite until next year, in the hope that the new law could be so constructed as to apply to him, but a careful reading of the statute does not support any such hope. Lyons will have to be hanged in the old fashion, and he is very much disappointed. Two other murderers are under sentence for execution on the same day that Lyons will be hanged. One is Charles Giblin, who shot to death a baker's wife who would not return to him the counterfeit bill which he had tried to pass on her. Giblin is a weakling, morally and physically—a wan, consumptive fellow who was an unskilful sort of counterfeiter until a greater crime ended his career. The third unfortunate creature is an Italian woman Chiara Cignarale, who is so prostrated by dread of the gallows that the Tombs' physician would not be surprised if she should die of fright. Her crime consisted of borrowing her lover's pistol, following her hated husband into the street and shooting him there. She speaks hardly any English, and an Italian priest consented to introduce the subject to her. This was easy, because the poor woman's mind could not be kept by him on the subject of religion. She was filled with horror of the gallows, and would talk with him about nothing else, after she understood that she was sentenced to die on July 17. He found that her terror was mostly physical, and she brooded constantly over the process of hanging. When the change of method was described to her, she clasped her hands joyfully and exclaimed that after all she would not have to be choked to death.

N. P. Railroad Accident.

When near Gold Creek station, fifty miles west of Helena, a Northern Pacific east-bound train jumped the track, the day coach, diner and Pullman rolling over into a ditch. In an instant the air was filled with shrieks, cries and wails of the frightened, injured and helpless passengers imprisoned in the overturned cars. It was nearly dark, and to add to the horror and discomfort of the scene a driving rain was coming down and the night air was chill and penetrating. The sleeper, diner and day coach were all lying on their sides in the ditch ten feet below the track, and from each car came a chorus of screams cries and excited exclamations. Many of the men, among whom were three doctors, got out very soon, and at once commenced the work of extricating the injured and imprisoned. Luckily all lamps had gone out and the cars did not catch fire. Men climbed to the uppermost side of each car and pulled out the passengers through the windows. The wounded were attended by the doctors and placed aboard a forward part of the train which remained on the track. Those in the day coach, which was nearly filled, fared the worst. Among them were the Riley & Wood theatrical troupe. Some of the men were forward in the smoking car and were not in the accident, but several lady members of the troupe and also some gentlemen were severely hurt. One of the actresses was horribly cut about the face and head. The baby of a Chinese woman, who was on board with her white husband, was also hurt. There were about twenty-one passengers in the sleeper, among whom were several ladies. None had retired, except one lady in the drawing room car, and she was uninjured. There must have been twenty-five ladies in the wreck and nearly twice as many gentlemen. The wonder is that so few were hurt and nobody was killed outright. The work of rescuing passengers occupied about two hours.

Lost and Found and Lost Again.

A strange story was the talk of the Morton house in New York. It told of a father who for thirteen years has been looking for his first born son, who now, just on the eve of recovering his child, has been frustrated by the desire of his second wife to surprise him. Fifteen years ago Dr. C. S. Scott, the most prominent dentist of Pittsburg, was married in Minneapolis where he then lived. A son was born to him, but the wedlock was not a happy one and the husband obtained a divorce giving him charge of the child who was then seventeen months old. The divorced wife, however, fled with the boy before Dr. Scott could get possession of him. Since then Pinkerton detectives have been searching for the missing boy without success. In the meantime Dr. Scott moved to Pittsburg, made a fortune and became proprietor of the Bijou Theater. Lately he went to New York to arrange for a spectacular play. He has not received a report from the Pinkertons for nearly a year when on Friday he was surprised by the following telegram from his second wife, who is a sister-in-law to Col. Richard Nevins and James G. Blaine, Jr.:

Pittsburg, Pa., June 29.—Go at once to Palmer house, Chicago, for your son Charley. If you delay you will lose him. I sent Richard Nevins for him, intending to surprise you, but he refused to come with him. Go without delay and be there to-morrow. Answer this so that I will know what to do.

MOLLIE D. SCOTT.

The delay caused by Mrs. Scott's intention to surprise her husband was unfortunately the cause of the divorced wife and the long-lost son again being spirited away. M. M. Ogden, Dr. Scott's business partner, received a telegram announcing that the doctor would be compelled to go to Iowa after the fugitives, and that he would not return until he had found the boy.

A Murderer's Confession.

Joseph Chevialkowski, the nephew of the murdered Pole, has now confessed that he killed his uncle. The remains of the murdered man were burried at Warren, Minn. On the way to the cemetery some of the Polish friends of the deceased tried to force the nephew to confess, but he insisted that he was innocent. At the grave when prayer was made he broke down and confessed that he had killed his uncle. He told the following story: He had been thinking about killing him for some time, believing that when he was out of the way he could get some of the property. Having gathered the tinfoil of tobacco packages, he made a wooden mold into which he poured the tin foil, and thus prepared the bullet with which to kill his uncle. When they got to the timber the uncle commenced to cut a tree and the nephew stepped back a few paces and shot him in the back. The uncle grasped at the tree and turned around and said: "Oh, Joseph, why did you do that?" Just as he had said this the charge in the other barrel, which was laded with shot, was sent through the old man's neck. The nephew then dragged the body into a slough, threw the gun into the Tamarack river and went to the neighbors and told the story about a big man attacking his uncle. There was talk of lynching him, but the sheriff was able to bring him safely to the Warren jail. When asked why he committed the crime he said that the devil possessed him and told him to do it. Chevialkowski is eighteen years old and was brought up by his murdered uncle who had always treated him kindly.

An Infant's Wanderings.

Ten days ago a babe was found on the steps of the Jackson residence in Gross Park in Chicago. Mrs. Jackson upon examining the wardrobe of the babe, was surprised to find some hand-made lace which she had wrought some years before. A closer examination revealed the astonishing fact that the lace was worked by no one but her unmarried daughter. Mrs. Jackson wrote to her daughter at Aberdeen, Dak., regarding the matter. The answer brought the information that some time ago a Mrs. Maynard, living in Aberdeen, Dak., made the acquaintance of Mrs. Jackson's daughter there. Miss Jackson spoke of her home in Gross Park. Four weeks ago Mrs. Maynard died in childbirth, and Miss Jackson had cared for the infant. The father left the little one in the care of Mrs. Perry, the aunt of the child, who was a half-sister of his dead wife. Mrs. Perry's home is at Stillwater, Minn., and on placing the infant in her charge Mr. Maynard went immediately to St. Louis. It is supposed that Mrs. Perry, tiring of her charge and knowing of the Jackson family, brought the babe to Gross Park and left it on the door steps. Mr. Maynard has been notified at St. Louis that his child is at the orphan asylum, and he will have it cared for elsewhere.

REPUBLICAN POLITICS.

What It Will Mean.

New York Press: Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia, signed the declaration of independence. The election of Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, his great grandson, to be president, will mean that that declaration has been reaffirmed.

A Free Trade Nut.

How is it, Messrs. free-traders: Is there a more outrageous and extortionate "trust" combine in this or any other country, than the hard-coal ring? And, as there is no import duty or internal tax whatever on hard coal, how is it possible, on your own theory of reasoning, for such a robber-monopoly to exist.

A Democratic Admission.

The democratic New York Sun does not deceive itself about the republican ticket. The Sun thoughtfully states the points of strength of Harrison and Morton, and warns the democratic party that the republican ticket is a formidable one. The Sun thus concludes: "About the best thing which the democrats of the doubtful states can now do is to cease contemplating the weakness of the ticket which their opponents put up, and to develop what strength and stability appertains to their own."

Democratic Misleading.

This is the feast to which the republican party invites the taxpayers of the country. Cheap whisky and tobacco, dear clothing and food and shelter.—Indianapolis Sentinel Democrat.

Now, here's richness of falsehood beyond the dreams of delirious imagination. The republican party offers cheap whisky, and tobacco, and dear clothing, does it? Oh, give us a season of repose! Why, when the democratic party went out of power whisky was 30 cents a gallon, or 3 to 5 cents a drink, and muslin prints were worth 25 cents a yard. After nearly twenty-five years of republican rule the cheapest whisky is retailed at $1 per quart, or 10 to 15 cents a drink, and muslin prints sell at 5 cents a yard. Talk about cheap whiskey and dear clothing.—Appleton Post.

Grover's Fate.

The Mining Record says: There is some thing curious about it, but Martin Van Buren and Grover Cleveland are the only two democratic presidents renominated since Jackson's time. It is still more curious to be reminded by the Detroit Tribune that Van Buren, a New Yorker also, having been once elected by a large majority was unanimously renominated in May, 1840. He had no competitors, and the proceedings of the democratic national convention, so far as he was concerned, was a mere formality, like those of the St. Louis convention in renominating Cleveland. He started in the second time with sure hope of success—as Cleveland does. He had the support of a horde of "office-holders"—as Cleveland has. He commenced to lose ground soon after the campaign opened—as Cleveland will. He was overwhelmingly defeated—as Cleveland will be.

Disheartened Already.

The Democrats are talking very bravely, but there is good reason to believe that they have very serious apprehensions as to the outcome of the campaign. A gentleman who holds the closest relations to the Democratic leaders says of the conference which Mr. Barnum reluctantly consented to resume his place as the chairman of the Democratic national committee:

Mr. Barnum was very anxious not to be the chairman. This was due not only to his age, to his long service and to the demands which his private business make upon his time, but because he is not satisfied to conduct a campaign upon the issue as presented. He is, moreover, very apprehensive as to the result, and it is known to some of his intimate friends that for these among other reasons he does not enter upon the campaign with any heart. It was found, however, when the committee met here to select their chairman that Gorman would not accept the place, and that Scott would not, and the position was, in a measure, thrown back upon Barnum. Mr. Barnum, I happen to know, enters upon the campaign in a very half-hearted manner, whatever he may say in the public prints. He is fearful of the effect of the discussion of the Mills bill upon the wage workers of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, and he knows very well that the Democrats must carry both New York and New Jersey if they are to succeed in the election. He himself is as much opposed to the policy of the Mills bill and the free trade plank in the Democratic platform as Mr. Randall is; but he yielded to the wishes of the other Democratic leaders and accepted his old place. The fact that the Democrats have insisted that Mr. Barnum, a radical Democratic protectionists, shall conduct the campaign upon the free trade basis is an illustration of the extremity to which the Democratic party is reduced. It is difficult to see how Mr. Barnum, holding the views as to protection which he does, can successfully conduct such a campaign.

Mr. Randall is not talking for publication to any one, but it is known that in recent private conferences with some of his more intimate friends he has expressed the opinion that Mr. Cleveland will most certainly be defeated, and the party cannot hope to win upon the platform laid down in the house by Mr. Mills and his free trade allies from the South.

New York's Estimate of Cleveland.

The rate at which familiarity may breed contempt when the subject of it is proven to be unworthy of confidence is strikingly displayed in the public career of Grover Cleveland. The following table shows the Cleveland majorities given by the City of Buffalo and the State of New York in the year 1882 and 1884. The excess, whether plurality or majority, is here classed as majority. The The majorities are all for Cleveland except that of Buffalo in 1884, which was against him. In 1882 Cleveland was the candidate for Governor and in 1884 for President:

	1882.	1884.
Buffalo's Cleveland majority	5,752	*1,093
New York's Cleveland majority	192,854	1,047

*Against Cleveland.

These figures tell a significant and startling tale. In 1882 Mr. Cleveland was comparatively unknown to either New York State or Buffalo. It is true that he had served a term as Sheriff of the county of which Buffalo is the principal city, and that, in the year named, he was Mayor of that place. So far as regards his fitness or capacity, however, for exalted political position he was an absolutely unknown man. The upheaval in politics produced by the factional fight among the Republicans in the State of New York had given Cleveland his opportunity for advancement. As a representative of a so-called "reform" movement he was chosen Mayor of Buffalo; and while standing for the same idea Daniel Manning secured his nomination for Governor. His election to the Governorship was as triumphant as was his previous elevation to the Mayoralty.

A glance at the figures will tell the story of the regard with which Mr. Cleveland was held in 1882 and 1884 by those who knew him best. The City of Buffalo, which gave him a majority of 5,752 in 1882, gave a majority of 1,093 against him in 1884. In 1882 the State of New York rolled up a majority of 192,854 for him, but all which it gave him two years afterward was just 1,047. The reason for this great change in attitude toward Mr. Cleveland can readily be pointed out. It is this: The people had found him out. They had learned, by a costly humiliating experience, that he was both morally and mentally unfit for the Governorship, that he was arrogant, cold-blooded, selfish and repellent in his dealings with those which official life had thrown him in contact with, and that he lacked both the ability and the inclination to observe any of the pledges which he had made to the people.

The experience which the State of New York had between 1882 and 1884 has been repeated on a larger scale by the nation in the interval which has elapsed since the latter year. The people of the country, too, have discovered that Cleveland, as a reformer, is a hollow and pretentious sham, who has violated his promises, debauched the civil service, insulted and humiliated the stricken and worthy soldiers of the republic, and injected an element of coarseness, vulgarity and sordidness into every department of the executive branch of the Government. It was an accident only which prevented the closing of Mr. Cleveland's political career at the election of four years ago. By no law of averages, permutations or probabilities ever formulated in mathematics is such an accident likely to be repeated within the next 100 years at least.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

SENATE.

The senate select committee on Indian traderships resumed its investigation into the charges of fraud in the letting of timber contracts on the Chippewa Indian lands in Wisconsin. D. L. McKay, state lumber inspector of Chippewa Falls, Wis., testified as to the value of stumpage on Indian reservations in that district, one of the charges being that the Indians on the Chippewa reservation were not paid the full value of their timber.

HOUSE.

While the house was considering the Mills bill, Mr. McKinley and other Republican members submitted motions to increase the duties on various items in the iron schedule, all of which were promptly voted down. On motion of Democratic members, the clause fixing the rate of duty on cast polished plate glass unsilvered, was stricken out, thus leaving in force the existing law; the clause imposing a duty of $11 a ton on slabs and billets of steel and restoring the present rate of 45 per cent ad valorem was stricken out; and a duty of four-tenths cent per pound was imposed on iron or steel, flat, with longitudinal ribs for the manufacture of fencing. The usual political discussion ran through the day's proceedings, and a mild controversy took place between Scott and Reed. Nothing unusual was said, however. The house, as well as the senate, adjourned from Monday to Thursday.

SENATE.

Senator Hoar's speech on the fisheries treaty, is likely to be the severest arraignment of Secretary Bayard and the administration that has been heard during the present session.

The senate adjourned until Monday without waiting to have the resolution extending the appropriations of the last fiscal year approved by the presiding officer of the senate. The enrolling force of the house was unaccountably slow in its work, and the senate, after waiting for some time for the house and taking a recess to enable the resolution to be submitted, adjourned.

HOUSE.

In the house Mr. Holman called up the senate land grant forfeiture bill, with amendments made by the house committee. As thus amended the bill which, as it came from the senate, proposed to forfeit grants applying to lands lying opposite portions of the railroads not now completed, declares a forfeiture of the lands lying opposite the portions of the roads not completed at the time specified in the granting acts. After some discussion, the committee's substitute was then adopted, and the question recurring on the passage of the bill as adopted, the vote resulted, yeas 141, nays 12—no quorum. The bill remains as unfinished business.

SENATE.

A member of the senate committee on appropriations, in speculating upon the final adjournment, remarked: There is about four week's work on general appropriation bills yet to be transacted.

HOUSE.

The speaker pro tem. laid before the house a message from the president, returning without his approval the bill granting a pension to Julia Welsh.

Mr. Haten, of Missouri, presented the report of the conferees on the agricultural bill, to the effect that they had reached an agreement upon all points of difference except the senate amendment appropriating $100,000 for sorghum sugar experiments.

The regular order was then demanded, being an aye and no vote on the passage of the land grant forfeiture bill, and the vote was taken, resulting, ayes 177, noes 8; so the bill was passed.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the tariff bill, the pending paragraph being that relating to iron or steel railway fish plates or splice bars.

Mr. Buchanan's motion to strike out the paragraph was rejected.

The reading of the bill then progressed rapidly, motions made on the republican side to strike out many of the paragraphs being rejected, generally without division and with little debate.

SENATE.

A delegation of about thirty workingmen engaged in making window glass was heard by the senate tariff subcommittee. They submitted a schedule, which they said just covered the difference between wages here and those abroad, and declared that it would be impossible for them to continue to receive their present compensation if duties were put down below the figures they submitted.

HOUSE.

The house passed the senate bill providing for the sale of the site of Fort Omaha, Neb., and appropriating $200,000 for the purchase of a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon.

A joint resolution was passed selecting Leonard H. Harris of Ohio, John A. Martin of Kansas, and John E. Hartranft of Pennsylvania, to fill vacancies on the board of managers of national homes for disabled soldiers.

The House passed 30 private pension bills. One for the relief of Mrs. Delilah Whipps was introduced by Mr. MacDonald, another by Mr. Rice granting a pension to Martin N. Kellogg. Mrs. Whipps is 78; her husband served in the war of 1812. Kellogg is a veteran of the Mexican war. The pension granted him is $72 a month.

The conferees on the river and harbor bill arrived at an agreement on all items except three, which relate to harbors on the Pacific coast.

A Singular Young Woman of Gardiner.

Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

About a fortnight ago a young woman in Gardiner, who, though but 17 years old, has been married two years, took it into her head to black her face so no one would know her, dress up as a smart negro boy and go out for a promenade. What amusement she expected to get out of the escapade it is hard to tell, but evidently she did not expect what did happen: She was arrested for one thing, but when the police officers learned that she was not a young colored man bent on burglary they let her go home. Since then, judging from the local papers, the one theme in Gardiner has been her exploit and the one question asked, "who was she?" After everybody had fully made up their minds that fifty or sixty different young women were each the one in question, the masquerader, in order to relieve the innocent from suspicion, told the whole story.

A Bride Swoons During the Wedding.

From the Cincinnati Enquirer.

A very exciting scene occurred in the Court-house recently. John Walford had procured a license to wed Miss Lena Horsch. They wanted the ceremony performed at once, and repaired to the private court rooms of the judge, where Noah Justice proceeded to tie the knot. Just as the last words were pronounced the bride began to waver, and a second later fell in a dead swoon, from which she did not recover for some time. There was great relief when she came to. The cause of the sudden giving way was, perhaps, due to the long journey from Ohio and the excitement of the moment. They left for Bloomington, Ill.

The Union bank officials of Providence, N. Y., have received word by cable that the whole bundle of securities, bills receivable and other property, stolen by Charles A. Pitcher, defaulting teller, has been recaptured in London. Pitcher had mailed them to "J. A. Roberts," his assumed name, and believed them safe from the bank and that it was in his power to keep their hiding place secret until the bank would be ready to compromise and come to terms on the basis of Pitcher's holding on to $150,000 cash. His stealings aggregated $700,000.

TALMAGE'S SERMON.

The Reverend Gentleman Preaches at Crete, Neb., on "None Like Jesus."

Faith Is the Hinge on Which Eternity Turns—The Grace That Can Forgive Small Sins Can Forgive Large Ones.

Sunday there was a great outdoor meeting at Crete, Neb.,—a Chautauqua meeting—and people from all parts were present. A sermon by the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., was the principal feature of the occasion. The reverend gentleman's subject was, "None Like Jesus." He took for his text, "Unto you therefore which believe he is precious." I Peter ii, 7. Following is the sermon.

We find for many years in this country commercial depression. What was the matter with the stores? With the harvests? With the people? Lack of faith. Money enough, goods enough, skilled brains enough, industrious hands enough, but no faith. Now what damages the commercial world damages the spiritual. Our great lack is faith. That is the hinge on which eternity turns. "O," says some one in the audience, "I have faith. I believe Christ came down to save the world." I reply that in wordly matters when you have faith you always act upon it. For instance, if I could show you a business operation by which you could make $5,000 you would immediately go into it. You would prove your faith in what I tell you by your prompt and immediate action. Now, if what you call faith in Christ has led you to surrender your entire nature to Jesus, and to corresponding action in your life, it is genuine faith, and if it has not, it is not faith at all.

There are some things which I believe with the head. Then there are other things which I believe with the heart. And then there are other things which I believe both with the head and heart. I believe, for instance, that Cromwell lived. That is a matter of the head. That is, I have no especial reason for believing them, and yet I want to believe them, and the wish is the father to the expectation. But there is a very great difference between that which we believe about ourselves and that which we believe about others. For instance, you remember not a great while ago there was a disaster in Pennsylvania, amid the mines; there was an explosion amid the damps, and many lives were lost. In the morning you picked up your newspaper and saw there had been a great disaster in Pennsylvania. You said: "Ah, what a sad thing this is; how many lives lost! O, what sorrow!" Then you read a little further on. There had been an almost miraculous effort to get these men out, and a few had been saved. "Oh," you said, "what a brave thing, what a grand thing that was! How well it was done!" Then you folded the paper up and sat down to your morning repast. Your appetite has not been interfered with, and during that day, perhaps you thought two or three times of the disaster. But suppose you and I had been in the mine, and the dying had been all around us, and we had heard the pickaxes just above us as they were trying to work their way down and after a while we saw the light, and the life bucket let down through the shaft, and, suffocated and half dead, we had just strength enough to throw ourselves over into it, and had been hauled out into the light. Then what an appreciation we would have had of the agony and darkness beneath, and joy of deliverence. That is the difference between believing a thing about others and believing it about ourselves.

We take up the bible and read that Christ came to save the world. "That was beautiful," you say, "a fine specimen of self-denial. That was very grand indeed." But suppose it was found that we ourselves was down in the mine of sin and in the darkness, and Christ stretched down his arm of mercy through the gloom and lifted us out of the pit, and set our feet on the Rock of Ages, and put a new song into our mouth. Oh, then it is a matter of handclapping, it is a matter of deep emotions. Which kind of faith have you, my brother?

It is faith that makes a Christian, and the difference between Christians. What was it that lifted Paul and Luther and Payson and Doddridge above the ordinary level of Christian character? It was the simplicity, the brilliancy, the power and the splendor of their faith. Oh, that we had more of it? God give us more faith to preach and more faith to hear. "Lord! we believe help thou our unbelief!" "To you which believe he is precious!"

First: I remark Christ is precious to the unbeliever, as a saviour from sin. A man says: "To whom are you talking? I am one of the most respectable men in the neighborhood, do you call me a sinner?" Yes! "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." You say, "How do you know anything about my heart?" I know that about it, for God announces it in his Word; and what God says is always right. When a man becomes a Christian people say: "That man sets himself above us."

Oh, no! Instead of setting himself up he throws himself down. He cries out: "I was lost once, but now I am found. I was blind once but now I can see. I prostrate myself at the foot of the cross of the Saviour's mercy."

What a grand thing it is to feel that all the bad words I ever uttered, and all the bad deeds I have ever done, and all the bad thoughts that have gone through my mind, are as though they had never been, for the sake of what Christ has done. You know there is a difference in stains. Some can be washed out by water, but other require a chemical preparation. The sin of the heart is so black and indelible a mark that no human application can cleanse it, while the blood of Jesus Christ can wash it out forever. O, the infinite, the omnipotent chemistry of the Gospel. Some man says: "I believe all that, I believe God has forgiven the most of my sins, but there is one sin I cannot forget." What is it? I do not want to know what it is, but I take the responsibility of saying that God will forgive it as willingly as any other sin.

O'er sins like mountains for their size,
The seas a sovereign grace expand,
The seas of sovereign grace arise.

There was a very good man about seventy-five years of age, that once said: "I believe God has forgiven me, but there was one sin which I committed when I was about twenty years of age that I never forgave for, and I can't feel happy when I think of it." He said that one sin sometimes came over his heart, and blotted out all his hope of heaven. Why, he lacked faith. The grace that can forgive a small sin can forgive a large sin. Mighty to save, Mighty to save. Who is the God like unto our God, that pardoneth iniquity? O, what Jesus is to the soul that believes in him! The soul looks up to Christ's face and says: "To what extent wilt thou forgive me?" And Jesus looks back into his face and says: "To the uttermost." The soul says: "Will it never be brought up again?" "Never," says Christ. Won't it be brought up again in Judgment Day?' "No," says Christ, "never in the Judgment Day." What bread is to the hungry, what harbor is to the tempest-tossed, what light is to the blind, what liberty is to the captive, that, and more than that, is Christ to those who trust him.

Just try to get Christ away from that Christian. Put on that man the thumb screw. Twist it until the bones crack. Put that foot in the iron boot of persecution until it is crushed to a pulp. Stretch that man on the rack of the Inquisition, and louder than the uproar of all the persecutors, you will hear his voice like the voice of Alexander Le Croix, above the crackling fagots as he cried out: "O Jesus! O, my beloved Jesus! O, divine Jesus who would not die for thee!"

Again, I remark that Christ is precious to the believer, as a friend. You have commercial friends and you have family friends. To the commercial friend you go when you have business troubles. You can look back to some day—it may have been ten or twenty years ago—when, if you had not had that friend, you would have been entirely overthrown in business. But I want to tell you this morning of Jesus, the best business friend a man ever had. He can pull you out of the worst perplexities. There are people in this audience who have got in the habit of putting down all their worldly troubles at the feet of Jesus. Why, Christ meets the business man on the street and says "O, business man, I know all thy troubles. I will be with thee. I will see thee through." Look out how you try to corner or trample on a man who is backed up by the Lord God Almighty. Look out how you trample on him. O, there is a financier that many of our business men have not found out Christ owns all the boards of trade, all the insurance companies and all the banking houses. They say that the Vanderbilts own the railroads; but Christ owns the Vanderbilts and the railroads, and all the plottings of stock gamblers shall be put to confusion, and God with his little finger shall wipe out their infamous projects. How often it has been that we have seen men gather up riches by fraud, in a pyramid of strength and beauty, and the Lord came and blew on it and it was gone; while there are those here to-day who, if they could speak out in this assemblage, or dared to speak out, would say: "The best friend I had in 1837; the best friend I had in 1857; the best friend I had at the opening of the war; the best friend I ever had has been the Lord Jesus Christ. I would rather give up all other friends than this one."

But we have also family friends. They come in when we have sickness in the household. Perhaps they say nothing, but they sit down and they weep as the light goes out from the bright eyes and the white petals of the lily are scattered in the blast of death. They watch through the long night by the dying couch, and then, when the spirit has gone, sooth you with great comfort. They say: "Don't cry, Jesus pities you. All is well. You will meet the lost one again." Then, when your son went off, breaking your heart, did they not come and put the story in the very best shape and prophecy the return of the prodigal? Where they not in your house when the birth angel flapped its wings over your dwelling? And they have been there at the baptisms and at the weddings. Family friends! But I have to tell you that Christ is the best family friend. Oh, blessed is that cradle over which Christ bends. Blessed is that nursery where Jesus walks. Blessed is that sick brow from which Jesus wipes the dampness. Blessed is that table where Jesus breaks the bread. Blessed is that grave where Jesus stands with his scarred feet on the upturned sod saying: "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Have you a babe in the house? Put it into the arms of the great Child Lover. Is there a sick one in the house? Think of him who said: "Damsel, arise." Are you afraid you will come to want? Think of him who fed the five thousand. Is there a little one in your house that you are afraid will be blind or deaf or lame? Think of him who touched the blinded eye and snatched back the boy from epileptic convulsion. Oh, He is the best friend. Look over your family friends to-day and find another that can be compared to him. When we want our friends they are sometimes out of town. Christ is always in town. We find that some will stick to us in prosperity who will not in adversity. But Christ comes through darkest night, and amid ghastly sorrow, and across roughest sea, to comfort you. There are men and women here who would have been dead twenty years ago but for Jesus. They have gone through trials enough to exhaust ten times their physical strength. Their property went, their health went, their families were scattered. God only knows what they suffered. They are an amazement to themselves that they have been able to stand it. They look at their once happy home, surrounded by all comfort. Gone! They think of the time when they used to rise strong in the morning and walk vigorously down the street, and had experienced a health they thought inexhaustible. Gone! Everything gone but Jesus. He has pitied them. His eye has watched them. His omnipotence has defended them. Yes, he has been with them. They have gone through disaster and he was a pillar of fire by night. They have gone across stormy Galilee, but Christ had His foot on the neck of the storm. They felt the waves of trouble coming up around them gradually, and they began to climb into the strong rock of God's defense, and then they sang as they looked over the waters: "God is our refuge and strength, an ever present help in time of trouble; therefore we will not fear though the earth be removed, though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah." The other day there was a sailor who came into the Bethel in New York, and said: "My lads (he was standing among sailors), I don't know what's the matter with me, I used to hear a good deal about religion and about Jesus Christ. I don't know that I have any religion, or that I know anything much about Christ; but when I was in mid-Atlantic I looked up one day through the rigging, and there seemed to come light through my soul. I have felt different ever since, and I love those I once hated, and I feel a joy I can't tell you. I really don't know what is the matter of me." A rough sailor got up and said: "My lad, I know what's the matter of you. You have found Jesus. It is enough to make any man happy."

His worth if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole earth would love him too.

I remark again: Christ is precious to the believer, as a final deliverer. You and I must after awhile get out of this world. Here and there, one perhaps may come out to eighty, to ninety years of age, but your common sense tells you that the next twenty-five years will land the majority of this audience in eternity. The next ten years will thin out a great many of these family circles. This day may do the work for some of us. Now, why do I say this? To scare you? No; but just as I would stand in your office, if I were a business man, and talk over risks. You do not consider it cowardly to talk in your store over temporal risks. Is it base in us this morning to talk a little while over the risks of the soul, that are for eternity? In every congregation death has the last year been doing a great deal of work.

Where is your father? Where is your mother? Your child? Your brother? Your sister? O, how cruel does death seem to be? Will he pluck every flower? Will he poison every fountain? Will he put black on every door knob? Will he snap every heart string? Can I keep nothing? Are there no charmed weapons with which to go out and contend against him? Give me some keen sword sharpened in God's armory, with which I may stab him through. Give me some battle ax that I may clutch it and hew him from helmet to sandal. Thank God, thank God, that he that rideth on the pale horse hath more than a match in him who rideth on the white horse. St. John heard the contest, the pawing of the steeds the rush, the battle cry, the onset until the pale horse came down on his haunches, and his rider bit the dust, while Christ, the conqueror, with uplifted voice, declared it: "O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction."

The sepulcher is a lighted castle on the shore of heavenly seas, and sentinel angels walk up and down at the door to guard it. The dust and the dampness of the grave are only the spray of the white surf of celestial seas, and the long breathing of the dying Christian, that you call his gasping, is only the long inhalation of the air of heaven. Oh, bless God for what Christ is to the Christian soul, here and hereafter!

I heard a man say some time ago that they never laugh in heaven. I do not know where he got his authority for that. I think they do laugh in heaven. When victors come home do we not laugh? When fortunes are won in a day do we not laugh? After we have been ten or fifteen years away from our friends and greet them again, do we not laugh? Yes, we will laugh in heaven. Not hollow laughter, not meaningless laughter, but a full, round, clear, deep, resonant outbreak of eternal gladness. Oh, the glee of that moment when we first see Jesus! I think we will take the first two or three years in heaven to look at Jesus; and if in ten thousand years, there should be a moment when the doxology paused, ten thousand souls would cry out: "Sing! Sing!" and when the cry was: "What shall we sing?" the answer would be: "Jesus! Jesus!" Oh, you may have all the crowns in heaven; I do not care so much about them. You may have all the robes in heaven; I do not care so much about them. You may have all the scepters in heaven; I do not care so much about them. You may have all the thrones in heaven; I do not care so much about them. But give me Jesus—that is enough heaven for me. O, Jesus! I long to see thee. Thou "chief among ten thousand, the one altogether lovely."

There may be some here who have come hardly knowing why they come. Perhaps it was as in Paul's time—you have come to hear what the babbler sayeth; but I am glad to meet you face to face, and to strike hands with you in one earnest talk about your deathless spirit. Do you know, my friend, that this world is not good enough for you? It cheats. It fades. It dies. You are immortal. I see it in the deathless spirit looking out from your eye. It is a mighty spirit. It is an immortal spirit. It beats against the window of the cage. I come out to feed it. During the past week the world has been trying to feed it with husks. I come out this morning to feed it with that bread of which if a man eat he will never hunger. What has the world done for you? Has it not bruised you? Has it not betrayed you? Has it not maltreated you? Look me in the eye immortal man, and tell me if that is not so. And yet, you will trust it? O, I wish that you could forget me, the weak and sinful man—that might I vanish from your sight this morning, and that Jesus might come in. Aye, he comes here this morning to plead for your soul—come in all covered with the wounds of Calvary. He says, "O, immortal man! I died for thee, I pity thee, I came to save thee. With these hands, torn and crushed, I will lift thee up into pleasures that never die." Who will meet—who will drive him back? When Christ was slain on the cross, they had a cross and they had nails, and they had hammers. You crucify by your sin, O impenitent soul, the Lord Jesus Christ. Here is a cross; but where are the nails? Where are the hammers? "Ah," says some one rejecting Christ, some one standing a long way off. "I will furnish the nails. I don't believe in that Jesus. I will furnish the nails; who will furnish hammers?" "Ah," says some hard heart, "I will furnish the hammers. We have no spears; who will furnish the spears? "Ah," says some one long in the habit of sin and rejection of Christ's mercy: "I will furnish them." Now we have all the instruments; the cross, the nails, the hammers, the spears, and crucifixion goes on. O, the darkness! O, the pangs! O, the tears! O, the death! "Behold the Lamb of God, that takest away the sin of the world."

Lord Jesus, help that man. He sits far back to-day. He does not like to come forward. He feels strange in a religious assemblage. He thinks, perhaps, we do not want him. O, Jesus, take that trembling hand. Put thine ear to that agitated heart and hear how it beats. O, lift the iron gate of that prison house and let that man go free.

Lord Jesus, help that woman. She is a wanderer. No tears can she weep. See, Lord Jesus, that polluted soul; see that blistered foot. No church for her. No good cheer for her. No hope for her. Lord Jesus, go to that soul. Thou wilt not stone her. Let the red hot chain, that burns to the bone till the bloody ichor hisses in the heat, snap at thy touch. O, have mercy on Mary Magdalene.

Lord Jesus, help that young man. He took money out of his employer's till. Didst Thou see it? The clerks were all gone. The lights were down. The shutters were up. Didst Thou see it? O, let him not fall into the pit. Rememberest Thou not his mother's prayers? She can pray for him no more. Lord Jesus, touch him on the shoulder. Touch him on the heart. Lord, save that young man. There are many young men here. I got a letter from one of them, who is probably here to day, and I shall have no other opportunity of answering that letter. You say you believe in me. O, do you believe in Jesus? I can not save you, my dear brother. Christ can. He wants and waits to save you, and he comes to-day to save you. Will you have him? I do not know what our young men do without Christ—how they get on amid all the temptations and trials to which they are subjected. O, young man come to Christ to-day, and put your soul and your interest for this life and for the next in his keeping. In olden times, you know, a cup-bearer would bring wine or water to the king who would drink it, first tasting himself, show that there was no poison in it, then passing it to the king who would drink it. The highest honor that I ask is that I may be bearer to-day to your soul. I bring you this water of everlasting life. I have been drinking it. It has never done me any harm. O, drink it, and live forever. And let that aged man put his head down on the staff, and let that poor widowed soul bury her worried face in her handkerchief, and these little children fold their hands in prayer, while we commend you to him who was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities; for to you which believe he is precious.

A Ruthless Awakening.

From the Providence Journal.

It was afternoon. The warm sun's declining rays were reflected back by the glass greenhouse on the slope of Tockwotton Hill, and the dark red locks of the tramp who lay peacefully sleeping in the shadow of the fence waved softly in the gentle breeze. No sound broke the stillness, save the rhythmic snore of the slumbering son of rest, which came in regular cadences as his bosom rose and fell. Afar down the hill a William goat was browsing among the hoopskirts and tomato cans that adorned the hillside. Time wore on. The quiet of the afternoon deepened as the sun sank toward the horizon. The tramp still slumbered. The bewhiskered goat still browsed, but now higher up on the slope. His rambling had brought him nearer the sleeping aristocrat of the road. The switching engine on India street tooted at intervals, and an occasional passing team rumbled a lullaby.

Suddenly an unearthly yell broke the twilight stillness. "Merciful heaven! What's that?" exclaimed the engineer on the switching engine. Even as he spoke a confused mass of goat and man came tumbling down the hillside, the man filling the air with terrified yells. At the bottom of the hill the goat released himself and scampered down the street. The man lay motionless a moment. Then, slowly rising, he felt of his limbs and tottered off. To a sympathetic workman who went to his assistance he said he was awakened by a pull on his hair that almost tore his scalp off, and when he saw the whiskers and horns of the goat before his half-opened eyes he thought the devil had him sure. In his fright he started down the hill. The goat made a butt at him, and, losing his balance, they both rolled down the incline together.

Five minutes later the goat was quietly filling up on the butt end of an upturned telegraph pole that lay on the sidewalk near the big oil tanks, and peaceful quiet again stole round the scene and nestled there.

How a Japanese Woman Travels.

There was a Japanese family on board, swells of the most approved pattern, who wore European dress with ease, and were devoted to cheese, bitter beer, and other foreign things that the Japanese are usually slow to adopt. The Japanese always wear their best clothes when traveling, so as to declare their rank and means, and the little woman rang the changes in her wardrobe three times a day, and her husband kept up with her. She had many astounding hats, huge-brimmed and high-crowned things, bristling with wings, loops, birds, and daggers, and when it came to leaving the ship each hat was brought up on deck tied in a large cotton handkerchief, and every article they possessed traveled separately. Their baggage made a heap that measured six feet every way, and the largest piece was a Japanese basket no larger than a good valise. There were thirty small pieces to be brought up and counted, and passed over the side of the ship and counted again, and the little boxes and bottles and jars and handkerchief bundles and loose pieces of clothing would have sent an average man mad. The little Japanese danced around in pearl colored trousers and black cutaway, and seemed to enjoy flourishing the paper on which the list was written, and counting his wife's hats, and he prolonged and repeated the ceremony until quiet lookers-on were ready to believe it a piece of acting, and not a plain incident of travel.—Japan Letter.

While shearing sheep at Chatfield, a son of D. Hisey noticed something peculiar about the appearance of a sheep's tongue and, calling his father's attention to the fact, the sheep was caught and examined. Upon opening its mouth it was seen that a ring of some kind was around the sheep's tongue. After a few moments it was taken off and found to be a solid gold ring, with a handsome set, valued at about $7. How the ring came on the sheep's tongue will probably remain a mystery, as it had been there some time, being deeply imbedded in the flesh.

Two hundred and three hundred bushels are being caught daily. It is expected that most of the crops will be saved as there has been so much wet weather that they can do but little damage. An effort is being made to completely exterminate them. Crops outside, and also in the district infested with these locusts never looked better.

A Prolific Family.

Col. Anisansel has been figuring lately on the soft snap enjoyed by some of the crowned heads of Europe, and wishing, incidentally, that he was one of them. He has finished his calculations on the royal family of England and finds that besides his poor mamma, his brothers and his children, the prince of Wales has 17 brothers-in-law, 16 uncles, 57 cousins and 58 nephews and nieces. He is allied to all reigning families of Europe and also to the house of Orleans and the house of Hanover.

A Dream of Fair Women.

Tennyson in his exquisite poem, dreams of a long procession of lovely women of ages past. This is all very well, but the laureate would have done the world a greater service if he had only told the women of the present how they could improve their health and enhance their charms. This he might easily have done by recommending the use of Dr. Pierce's 'Favorite Prescription. Health is the best friend of beauty, and the innumerable ills to which women are peculiarly subject, its worst enemies. Long experience has proven that the health of womankind and the 'Favorite Prescription" walk hand in hand, and are inseparable. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Leave hope behind,
All ye who enter here!

So ran the dire warning which Dante read on the portals of the Inferno. So runs the cruel verdict of your friends if you are overtaken by the first symptoms of that terrible disease, consumption. "Leave hope behind! your days are numbered"!! And the struggle against death is given up in despair. But while there is life, there is hope! Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured hundreds of cases worse than yours; and it will cure you, if taken in time. But delay is dangerous. No power can restore a wasted lung; the "Golden Medical Discovery," however, can and will arrest the disease.

Can't Sleep!

Sleeplessness and fearful dreams are the earliest and surest signs of brain exhaustion. In healthy sleep brain force is being stored up to meet the next day's demands. But nowadays the nervous system has been so overtasked that it is unable to control the mind, and at night the worries, troubles, and work are as present as during the day. Hence the brain has not time to recuperate its energies. The proper medical remedies are sedatives, nerve tonics, laxatives, and regulators of the general functions. Coca and celery are the sedatives and nerve tonic demanded, and in Paine's Celery Compound their full beneficial effect is obtained. It also contains, in scientific proportions, the best remedies of the materia medica for constipation, and kidney and liver disorders. This is a brief description of the medicine which has brought sweet rest to thousands who tossed in sleeplessness from night to morning, or whose morbid dreams caused them to awake more tired than ever. All nervous, sleepless, debilitated or aged people will find vigor and perfect health in the great nerve tonic, PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND. Price $1.00. Sold by Druggists. Circulars free.

Farm, Garden and Household.

Care of the Finger Nails.

From the Cleveland Plaindealer.

In order to have a pretty-looking hand the finger nails must be kept in good shape. They should never be cut too short, as this deforms the finger ends and renders them stubby. They should always project a trifle beyond the extremity of the finger, and be paired only to a slight curve, without encroaching too much on the angles. To preserve the half moon, or lunula, which borders the lower part of the nail, and is thought a great beauty, the skin must be kept from encroaching upon it, by pushing it back every morning with a blunt ivory instrument. By this means the annoying hang-nail will be prevented also. Filing or scraping the nails is very injurious, as it tends to thicken their substance. The nail-brush should alone be used for cleaning and polishing the nails.

Alfalfa, or Lucerne.

In California, alfalfa, or as it is sometimes called, "Chilian clover," is the mainstay of the stock raisers, and with irrigation produces enormous crops, which are cut twice and sometimes three times a year in those sections where there is winter only in name. It is somewhat strange that although a well known European crop, under the name of lucerne, it has never been grown to any great extent in the older settled parts of the United States. One reason, perhaps, is that it does not flourish well in those lands so common in New England and the Atlantic slope, having a light soil, with poor sandy, gravelly or stony subsoil, as its roots penetrate deep, often to the depth of a dozen feet.

Like clover, it draws largely upon the atmosphere and its wide-spreading roots enrich the soil with vegetable matter. It is planted in drills on prepared land, cut lightly the first year, is in full bearing the third, and may afterward yield three, and sometimes five crops annually, depending on the warmth of the climate, the rainfall, &c.

Alfalfa, with a little pains taken, has done well in Hamilton County, O., and we see no reason why it could not be introduced to great advantage generally.

The Onion as a Cure-All.

We have received the following with an urgent request for publication:

From the Reading Daily Eagle.

Onions inhaled cause sleep, rest and repose. The soldier on his march and the exhausted iron worker get great strength from eating the onion. Tie a fresh onion around the neck and bruise it to make its odor thorough, and you secure sound sleep from its nightly inhalation.

DANIEL R. CLYMER,
Ex-Mayor of Reading, Pa., United States of North America. (For foreign lands.)

It will be an act of humanity to the restless, nervous and sick to copy this in your paper—a God-like act. Have the kindness to send a paper.

THE ONION SECURES SLEEP, REST AND REFRESHMENT.

To the editor of the World, New York: In Wednesday's issue of your most valuable paper I found Mr. Clymer's discovery. My only son, 7 years old, has just recovered from a most malignant attack of scarlet fever, and has kept his parents awake for the last twelve days by his nervous sleeplessness. I tried the simple remedy of tying an onion around his neck last night, and found this morning that he had an undisturbed sleep all night. By giving these lines space in your next issue, you will oblige yours,

Water Regularly.

American Rural Home.

Regularity in all departments connected with the care and management of poultry is absobutely necessary to insure success when other things are favorable, and in no one thing is it more true than in watering regularly. While most of our poultry, whether thoroughbred and reared in small flocks with extra care, or whether they be the large and well-mixed flocks to be found on the places of our thrifty and well-to-do farmers, are generously supplied with food, scarcely any attention is paid to supplying them with pure fresh water daily, in winter as well as summer. All live stock requires water each day, and it is not only cruel, but it is unprofitable to deprive them of it. Many a farmer's flock has to wait during the winter for the rains and snows to get a drink, while other flocks resort to the pools of manure water in and around the barnyard, because their owners are too careless and indifferent as to their actual wants and necessities. If confined during the warm weather, by all means do not neglect them in this respect, for nothing can be more cruel. If a breeder only makes it a part of the regular routine of management, this watering the fowls each day, it will be found a very light task indeed, while the fowls will thank you in many ways for your attention. We beg of those poultry-breeders who are remiss in regard to this matter, to act on our advice and water regularly daily.

Regulating the Cellar.

American Agriculturist.

A great mistake is sometimes made in ventilating cellars and milk-houses. The object of ventilation is to keep the cellars cool and dry, but this object often fails of being accomplished by a common mistake, and instead the cellar is made both warm and damp. A cool place should never be ventilated, unless the air admitted is cooler than the air within, or is at least as cool as that or a very little warmer. The warmer the air the more moisture it holds in suspension. Necessarily, the cooler the air the more this moisture is condensed and precipitated. When a cool cellar is aired on a warm day, the entering air being in motion appears cool; but as it fills the cellar the cooler air with which it becomes mixed chills it, the moisture is condensed, and dew is deposited on the cold walls, and may often be seen running down them in streams. Then the cellar is damp, and soon becomes moldy. To avoid this the windows should only be opened late at night—the last thing before retiring. There is no need to fear that the night air is unhealthful; it is as pure as the air of midday, and is really dryer. The cool air enters the apartment during the night and circulates through it. The windows should be closed before sunrise in the morning, and kept closed and shaded during the day. If the air of a cellar is damp it may be thoroughly dried by placing in it a peck of fresh lime in an open box. A peck of lime will absorb about seven pounds, or more than three quarts, of water, and in this way a cellar or milk-room may soon be dried, even in the hottest weather. A bushel of lime absorbs twenty-seven pounds of water and still appears as a dry powder. In this condition it will be very useful to spread over the garden or lawn, or around fruit trees, or it may be used for whitewash. This precaution is often necessary in the dairy, because of the prevalence, where air is damp, of mildews and the various forms of mold. The orange and red kinds of mold especially, which sometimes form upon the cream, have a most injurious effect upon the butter.

The Annual Trot.

The American Rural Home.

The trotters in their annual circuit have reached Rochester, accompanied by their usual followers, who expect to win money either by betting on the races, by operating gambling machines, or in various other ways not justified by the accepted code of morals, or conducive to the welfare of society.

Wherever groups of young men gathered you could hear them discussing the merits of the different horses, the probabilities of the varios trots to come off, and boasting of the winnings in the pools. Pools were sold in numerous drinking places, and the flushed and excited faces of young men, passing in and out, did not speak well for their influences upon them. It is perfectly safe to say that a great deal of valuable time was wasted in Rochester upon the trots, and that they did not contribute in any great degree to the intellectual or moral elevation of our citizens.

It is said by apologists for the trotting and race courses, that they are necessary to stimulate the breeding of thorough-bred, fast horses. But what valuable end is promoted by breeding such horses as contend for prizes on the trotting course? Are they the kind of horses required for service by farmers, or any other class of citizens except sporting men, a class, we submit, that does not contribute much to the world's greatness.

In breeding trotters, all important qualities save fleetness are bred out. A great trotter is worth nothing for work or for service on the road. They have not the strength and endurance to travel great distances daily, drawing a load behind them. Before a skeleton gig, on a spurt of a few miles, they can get over the ground with the speed of a hare or a greyhound, but that is all. What the farmer or merchant or professional man wants is a good, strong, fleet carriage horse, with great powers of endurance, well built upon models of symmetry and beauty. The trotter is the gambler's, the jockey's horse, in which the great mass of mankind have but little interest. We do not want horses traveling our streets and parks and highways at the rate of a mile in 2:15 or or 2:40, or even three minutes, endangering the lives of citizens, but horses that can strike a gait of ten miles an hour and keep it up for several successive hours, with our families in a carriage behind them, without appearing exhausted; such horses are appreciated by all classes. Such driving does not endanger the lives of those we meet, or those we pass, while it affords much innocent enjoyment.

To breed such horses requires careful selection, persevered in for many years, of horses possessing a combination of many excellent qualities, and such horses will sell for prices that will well compensate the scientific breeder. Let us all join in encouraging the breeding of such horses, while we discourage and condemn the breeding of the long, lank, crooked, ugly trotter.

How to Keep Stock in Condition.

From the American Agriculturist.

Young animals at this season are very susceptible to cold and dampness, and any check through failure to supply a sufficiency of food at regular period, or exposure to wet and cold, may produce injurious results. Young colts at this season should be allowed to remain with their dams as long as they will suckle, as but little work is required of breeding mares during the winter, and if the mares give large quantities of milk the colts will grow rapidly. Where the young stock is dependent upon the dams the food must be of a kind that produces milk rich in all the elements necessary for structural growth. Ground oats twice a day, with a plentiful supply of hay, will afford an abundant amount of nourishment in the shape of milk, and on cold days an allowance of corn meal may be given with advantage.

Young calves are often deprived of the milk that naturally should go to them, owing to its value for market, substitutes being given them the skim milk usually allowed. Unless judgment is exercised in feeding the calves scours will result, from the effects of which the calves do not recover until they have been seriously injured in growth. Young pigs that have been suddenly weaned, and especially if taken from the sows too soon, are often "stunted" in such manner as to debar them from becoming large, heavy hogs at any time. It is important to be careful in winter, for the reason that when the young stock is weakened through mistakes in feeding the cold weather often comes upon them at a time when they are physically unable to endure it.

It is best not to wean the young stock too soon, but, if it becomes necessary to do so, the feeding should be done often, and, if possible, the food should be warm. The younger an animal the more rapid its growth and the more frequent its times of feeding; hence, when they are allowed only three meals a day, the same as the adults, they do not thrive as they do when fed oftener and in smaller quantities. Dieting the animals is necessary in winter, in order to avoid costiveness of the bowels, as well as indigestion, and therefore the adults and young stock should receive succulent food, such as ensilage or roots, but in the case of the young stock roots without ensilage may be fed cooked if they are old enough to eat well. The dieting of young stock by feeding a variety of food as they are gradually weaned will save them much sickness, as they are easily affected by sudden changes.

During the winter months much time may be saved by keeping the young stock in good condition, as they will start off in the spring with an advantage which will more than compensate for whatever extra care may be given. As the winter is not over when the early lambs are dropped, a place must be provided in advance for the ewes. To have the lambs dropped in the fields, with the temperature below freezing, is very severe on them, and those that do not perish seldom recover entirely. Give the lambs a warm dry place for the first few days of their existence and one-half the trouble with them will be over. Young pigs are very tender, and if farrowed in midwinter seldom prove satisfactory afterward unless an attendant gives them close attention for the first week, as they easily become so chilled as to be unable to derive nourishment, and as there are usually a few strong pigs in every litter the weaker ones are crowded back, becoming subject to the severity of the cold on account of an insufficient supply of nourishment, and as all young animals are subject to competition when together, they should never be crowded at any time.

The Turmoil of the Niagara Rapids Created Madness in Him.

"I have not the least doubt," said an eminent American physician at a recent medical convention, "that at least one out of every ten of the people in this country live under some form of insanity. In some it becomes violent; in others noticeable; in others never known or suspected, except there is what might be termed a collusion of circumstances."

There have been some curious cases of this last species of insanity. Some seven or eight years ago a public official of the State of Ohio visited Niagara Falls with his family for a month's rest. He was nervous and worn out, and, there were certain business and political matters which followed him there and could not be shaken off. The gentleman did not realize that his nerves were at all shaken; on the contrary, he prided himself in believing that he could endure more mental worry than three ordinary men. He had been at the falls three or four days when he was joined by a Chicago capitalist. The two had a speculation together, and the details were to be settled here.

One day after dinner the pair went into Prospect Park and sat down on a bench facing the rapids, and not over five feet from the water. When they had talked for an hour or so, the Ohio gentleman seemed to be somewhat excited in his speech and movements. He threw several sticks into the water, talked in loud tones, and soon attracted attention. The capitalist thought it a bit queer, but felt no uneasiness until the other suddenly seized him in a tremendous grip and said:

"Blank, you are a d——d scoundrel, and I'm going to send you over the falls!"

The capitalist was the smaller and the weaker man, and he felt the helplessness of the situation. He was gripped by the shoulders, but he used his hands to clench the seat behind him, and replied to the lunatic:

"I know I'm a bad man, and you must give me time to pray."

"All right, all right," said the Ohioan; "you shall have two minutes for prayers, and then we'll go over the falls together. Say, Blank, you are a d——d good fellow, after all, and we'll go together."

The idea with the Chicago man was, of course, to gain time. The people who had been attracted by the loud talk had passed on, and it so happened that no one else came that way.

He hoped the lunatic might change his mind after two minutes, but instead of that he grew more impatient declaring that they must hurry up or they would be too late. Despairing of aid from others, the capitalist finally said:

"See here, Mr. Blank, let's go up and jump off the Goat Island bridge. We'll have further to swim, and I want to leave my wallet with some one."

"By George! Good idea; come on!" exclaimed the other, and they walked up the path and out of the park arm in arm. They were no sooner out of sight of the rapids than the Ohioan began to grow calmer, and as they bore off toward the hotels he removed his hat, scratched his head in a thoughtful way, and picked up the point he dropped a quarter of an hour before and went on debating the transaction as if nothing unusual had occurred. An hour later, when asked if he was in earnest in threatening his friend, he was completely dumfounded, nor could he be made to believe that anything of the sort had occurred. However, a dim suspicion that he might have been unduly excited by the roar and clash of the waters crept into his mind. He went down to the park alone, but returned almost at once, his face very pale, his eyes betraying wildness, and his whole manner showing that he had passed through a severe struggle.

"I shall keep away from the water hereafter," he said to the capitalist. "I couldn't stay there five minutes without committing suicide or murder."

The matter was of course kept quiet, even from the wife, but two years later, while the gentleman was making a trip on the Ohio River he was suddenly missed, and he has never been heard of since. The boat was racing with another, and the probabilities are that the excitement brought back his passion for self-destruction, and th be went overboard.

A Comical Mistake.

The Boston Budget tells a comical story about a churchman of that city. He was selecting a library for his Sunday school, and among other religious works determined to have a full set of the "Lives of the Saints." He thought he had secured all the volumes, when suddenly his eye lit upon a book which bore on its back the legend, "St. Elmo." It was not uniform with the rest, and referred to a saintly character with which he was not familiar, but he did not wish to show his ignorance. He therefore ordered the bookseller to put it in the box of holy literary treasures which was to be sent home the next day. If the admirer of the saints has read "St. Elmo" he will find it quite as readable, though possibly not so pious, as the average Sunday-school library book.

Hindu Child Marriages.

It is essential for the honor of a Hindu family of good caste, says a writer in a contemporary, that it should contain no unmarried daughter of mature years. The existence of such a daughter is not only a social disgrace, but a religious crime. When, therefore, a female infant is born, the first idea of her father's mind is not one of pleasure, nor perhaps of very active regret, but simply how to find a husband for her. It is not necessary that she should become a wife in our sense of the word. It suffices that she should be given in marriage, and go through the ceremony of the Seven Steps, which completes the religious rite. Aged Brahmans of good family still go about the country, marrying, for a pecuniary consideration, female infants whom they sometimes never see again. Within the memory of men still living this abominable practice was a flourishing trade. A Kulin Brahman, perhaps white haired, half blind, and decrepit, went the round of his beat each spring, going through the ceremony of marriage with such female infants as were offered, and pocketing his fee, and perhaps never returned to the child's house. So long as he lived she could marry no other man; when he died she became a widow for life. The Hindu child widow is looked upon as a thing apart and accursed, bearing the penalty in this world for sins which she has committed in a past existence. Her hair is cut short, or her head is shaved altogether; she exchanges her pretty childish clothes for the widow's coarse and often squalid garment; she is forbidden to take any part in any village festival or family gathering; the very sight of her is regarded as an ill omen. Her natural woman's instincts are starved into inanition by constant fasts, sometimes prolonged to seventy-two hours. Amid the genial and brightly-colored life of the Hindu family she flits about disarrayed, silent, shunned, disfigured—in some parts of India a hideously bald object—forbidden all joy and all hope. There are hundreds of thousands of widows in India who have acquiesced in their cruel lot. They accept with a pathetic faith and resignation the priestly explanation which is given to them. They penitently believe that they are expiating sins committed in a past life, and they humbly trust that their purifying sorrows here will win a reward in the life to come.—London Standard.

Bravery in Ocean Peril.

We are not without abundant and well-authenticated stories of remarkable bravery in ocean perils. Mr. W. Clark Russell, in his late book, cites several which may serve as examples of a virtue which the world never fails to praise and honor. In the narrative of the loss of the Kent in 1825, it was related that when it was seen that the fire was gaining fast, and while several hundreds of people were rushing wildly about in search of husbands, children or parents, several old soldiers and sailors, giving up all hope, but without making any fuss, went and sullenly seated themselves directly over the magazine, and there waited with folded arms and set faces for the powder to catch, so that there might be an end at once to their sufferings. In the case of the loss of one of the East India Company's ships, all the boats but one were lost, and into that eight of the crew jumped and rowed away, leaving the rest on the sinking vessel. Those who were left shouted to the others to return—not, they said, to carry any of them off, but simply to rescue two little children, who could add no weight to the boat; and the seamen returned, took the infants and rowed away again. Ten minutes later the ship went down, and all on board perished. When the Montreal burned off Quebec, a mother was thrown into the water with her children. With one hand she clung to a rope, with the other she kept the head of a child above water, and with her teeth fastened to its dress she sustained a second child. She could not scream, and she would have been drowned in a few moments had not her situation been noticed. In the wreck of the Queen Victoria, a discharged soldier saw a woman with a child in her arms and offered to take it that she might be free to help herself. She consented, and he placed the child on his shoulder. But the mother's love proved too strong. She looked on a moment, and then passionately snatched the child back, and the two were drowned, while the soldier swam ashore. Such instances might be multiplied indefinitely. Every shipwreck furnishes something of the kind; and one can not help thinking that human nature, with all its faults and weaknesses, has still a saving grace of goodness so long as deeds like these continue to be performed whenever occasion calls for them.

The Russian Guards.

The Novoe Vremya publishes the following account of the war service of the Russian Guards: "Created in 1691, they received their baptism of fire in 1695-6 during the two Azof campaigns, after which came the following exploits in their order of date: Narva, 1700; capture of the fortress of Nienschanz, 1703; battle of Pultowa, 1709; siege of Viborg, 1710; battle of the Pruth, 1711; siege of Stettin, 1712; of Eigenstadt, Hango, 1713; capture of Otchakoff, 1737; capture of Khotine and battle of Stawugans, with the Swedes, 1739. After this a long interval elapsed before the guards reappeared in the field at Austerlitz in 1805. They were present afterwards at Friedland in 1807, Borodino in 1812, Bautzen, Culm and Leipsic in 1813, and La Fere Champenoise and Paris in 1814. In 1828 they fought in Turkey before Varna and in the action of Hadji Hassan Larom. In 1831, during the Polish war, they took part in the combats at Szimanowo, Przetyn, Rudki, Ostrolenka, and in the assault on Warsaw. In 1863 they served during the Polish insurrection, and their last active service was during the Turkish war of 1877-8."

Charley Henderson, the sport and confidence man, who recently swindled an old farmer, aged eighty years, of Shelby county, Ky., out of $4,000 by the three-card monte trick, has been captured and lodged in jail at Shelbyville, Ky. As Mr. Hedden, the old farmer, has gone insane over his loss, the people of Shelby county say that if Henderson is not convicted owing to the insanity of Hedden they will lynch him before he shall be allowed to escape. When arrested Henderson, who was hiding in the country, had $500 upon his person.

Insomnia—Sleeplessness.

From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Sleeplessness is about as common a complaint as indigestion, and often as distressing as pain. The causes are many and there are, therefore, many different means of relief suggested, each having a measure of success according as it is appropriately employed.

The expedients resorted to or remedies proposed for insomnia are generally such as will equalize the blood circulation in the head, either by increasing or diminishing it. In feverish excitement the cold douche, or a sprinkling of the back of the head and neck with cool water, followed by wiping dry, is said to be efficacious. In cases of pure mental over-excitement perhaps the better way is to lure the blood down to the lower extremities by a hot foot-bath, or hot bottles to the feet. Dr. Von Gellhorn has found this to be a useful plan of inducing sleep: A piece of cloth about eighteen inches wide, and of sufficient length, dipped in cold water and wrapped about the leg, the wet bandage to be well covered with a dry one, and a long stocking drawn over all to keep in place. It has been found to reduce the temperature tested in the external ear canal. In conditions of general debility, or weak heart's action, it may happen that wakefulness results from a lack of good blood brain circulation, and then the use of general tonics during the day is necessary to improve the action of vital organs, but by way of temporary expedients such a person will do well to have handy, by the bedside, a pitcher of milk, and if toward early morn there is a wakefulness, with a sense of oppression about the chest or pit of the stomach, a drink of milk will act as a food stimulant and improve the heart's action and the blood circulation thus relieving sleeplessness. When, owing to slow digestion, it is found best to eat a light evening meal, a glass of milk on retiring may be advisable, but good judgment must be used in choice of foods at bed time, since sleeplessness and bad dreams often result from irritation of undigested loads in the stomach.

Aromatic spirits of ammonia may be used as a mild stimulant for anemic sleeplessness, and a drop or two of tincture of belladonna, for nervous excitability which postpones sleep, but the use of chloral and morphia should be very exceptional, and never as a nightly resource. These or proprietary anodynes are dangerous expedients, especially for chronic invalids. Sleep is indeed like the beauty which it favors, dependent upon a general wholeness, health and balance of natural functions, and all those influences which favor soundness of mind and body, favor their normal operations, one of which is sleep.

Another chapter might be written on mind-cure for insomnia, for methods of tricking one's self into the land of nod. The power to psychologize one's own mind into inactivity, repose and sleep has been acquired by some, while others have hit upon little ideas of their own, such as going to bed with one stocking on, climbing over the foot-board, lying in some peculiar position, or some other curious excentricity which is effectual simply because the person who adopts it believes it will induce sleep; therefore, it does induce sleep. These are all innocent expedients which may be indulged in ad libitum, but some notions are not so. We once knew of a young woman who could only sleep on board a steamboat, and this so seriously inconvenienced herself and friends that it was best to discourage it. Don't be too cranky—just cranky enough.—From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

An Hungarian of '48.

Hungarian papers announce the death of old Ferencz Renyi, a hero of one of the most terrible episodes of the Hungarian war of independence in 1848. For thirty-six years Renyi has been a lunatic in a Buda-Pesth asylum, and the history of his sufferings is recorded after his death by the Petit Parisien. Ferencz Renyi was a young schoolmaster of twenty-seven years at the beginning of the war, proud, handsome, and full of buoyant life. His pupils adored him, and he was always welcome among the villagers, whether he came with his violin to play to their dances, or whether his voice was heard among the patriots chanting the praise of their country. He lived with his mother and sister and was engaged to a bright young Hungarian girl, when the Government, after proclaiming the independence of the country, called all good patriots to arms. Ferencz left his school and enlisted in the ranks. One day after having fought valiantly at the head of a detachment of soldiers, he was taken prisoner by the Austrians. Brought before Gen. Haynan, Reyni refused to indicate the place where the rest of his regiment lay hidden. On learning that his home was in a neighboring village, the general sent for the mother and sister and brought them into the room where the prisoner was kept. "Now give me the information I require, if the lives of these two women are dear to you," said General Haynan to him. Renyi trembled, his eyes filled with tears, but he remained silent. "Do not speak my son," cried the old mother; "do your duty and think not of me, for at the best I have only a few days to live." "If you betray your country," added his sister, "our name will be covered with shame, and what is life without honor? Do not speak, Ferencz. Be calm! I shall know how to die." Renyi remained silent, and a few minutes later the two women were dead. Another trial was to come. General Haynan sent for Renyi's future wife, who was weaker than his mother and sister. With wild cries the girl flung herself at her lover's feet, pleading, "Speak, speak, Ferenez. See I am young, I love you; do not let me be killed. You will save yourself and me if you speak out. When you are free we will go far away and be happy. Speak, my Ferencz, and save your future wife." She took his hands, clinging to him as a drowning man clings to his last support. The young Hungarian was choked with tears, but suddenly he pushed the girl aside and turned away. Once more she cried to him, but he did not heed her. Then the soldiers seized her. "Be cursed," she shrieked; "be cursed, you who let me die; you who killed me; who are my assassin." Renyi remained silent. The girl was shot, and the prisoner was taken back into his cell, but his reason had fled and he was dismissed. Some friends found him and gave him shelter. After Hungary was once more suppressed and peace established they obtained a place for him in the asylum in which he has recently died.

A SEASHORE ROMANCE.

The History Lying Back of a Pair of Blue Eyes.

Newport Letter to New York Herald.

He was listening to the quick waltz thrown out in a torrent of sound waves by the orchestra when I joined him, and we sat and discussed terrestrial events on the half-moon gallery of the Casino. The latest society on dit, the clever playing of the Englishmen in the international polo game, the yachting gossip of the day, and various other subjects passed in review in the thread of conversation, when, after a moment's pause, he remarked: "The story in the Herald of the mysterious woman in the cab on Bellevue avenue, who tried to get a note to a gentleman, made me think of the various episodes occurring nearly every day which rarely come to the surface to form a topic for the gossips. For that matter, in these times it is astonishing that so little comes out under the sunlight. I don't refer to mere chronique scandaleuse here in Newport, but to the domestic dramas, the heart-burnings resulting from acts really sufficient to cause pain—the gale of wind that may rage beneath a smiling face and the struggle that goes on from one morning to the next to attain something which ought to be possible, but which isn't in the order of things. Perhaps I was in a brown study when you came along. Well, so I was, and I'll tell you what I was thinking about. I can't order a bottle to fill up the chinks, for they are too virtuous here to sell wine.

"In the first place, do you remember that girl I pointed out the other day—the one we saw on the avenue?"

"Of course I remember her. She was pretty enough. You said you would tell me about her 'later.'"

Pretty, indeed, she appeared, with her flaxen hair, her large Dresden china blue eyes, and the under side of a pink hydrangea flower combination of her cheeks. She wore a piquant white gown and a big hat with nearly a foot of brim, and the youth as well as the oldsters had their fill of staring as she went by in the carriage. Oh, yes, I remember her very well.

"Well, I'll tell you her story. She is Miss ——, and she only came here for a few days' flyer to visit some of her acquaintances. She is passing the summer at another resort. She is twenty, I believe. She didn't look it, did she? She never looked her years. When she was only twelve she had the manners and appearance of sixteen. When she was just fourteen she was a——but I anticipate.

"Her near relatives live in New York, you see, and the girl used to receive private instruction from a governess, go to the dancing class, and take her exercise on the avenue like other chicks. In the staff of servants there was a clean-limbed young Englishman whom some one of the family picked up across the water. He had red cheeks and a good face, and he possessed something of an education, so that he was not a mere stable boy. His place was on the box with the coachman. He wore 'tops' pulled up high over his shapely legs, and his livery was snugfitting, with its bright buttons and the cockade on the side of his hat. When the little miss stepped out of the coupe the trim footman stood beside the open door. It was not long before the two caught one another casting sheep's glances, and the little girl was not averse to turning her big blue optics on the dark ones of her attendant. During the autumn, after the family came back, Missy used to ride on her pony, and Henry, the footman, rode behind her on a decorous cob. Perhaps it was lonely for the child—she was but just fourteen, don't you see? At any rate, there was before long a change of the conventional equestrian positions of mistress and groom, and the park policemen sometimes saw the two not only riding side by side, but they witnessed other little familiarities which might have made them stare if park policemen had not gotten over being surprised.

"Well, things progressed until finally, one fine afternoon, it was arranged that Missy should take a run up the Hudson to pass a few days with a friend of the family. So she was comfortably seated in a train at Forty-second street, and she started on her short journey.

"Started, I said. It was the strangest thing in the world that the same morning Henry should have received notice that some of his friends in the old country had arrived and wished to see him very much. Therefore he asked for a day off. He was a family favorite and he got it. When the train left the station Henry was in the smoking car. Before Miss Blue Eyes reached the point up the road where she was to disembark Mr. Footman was seated beside her—he was out of uniform—and instead of getting off the pair went on to Poughkeepsie, where they arrived just in time to catch a train going back to New York. They took it, and that evening the progressive young lady had put on her oldest looks and manner, so as to lead the clergyman to whom they applied to believe that she was of marriageable years. She didn't go up the Hudson to pay her visit until the following afternoon, and at the station it might have been noticed that she parted with a red-cheeked young man in a manner so affectionate as to lead to the supposition that she was about to depart for a year's absence. And so things went on for the entire winter. The girl used to meet her footman husband at some place up town on the east side, and they escaped suspicion until after the holidays. But for her desire to indulge in little familiarities with Henry, who used to be seated in the front hall in full 'uniform' during reception hours, all might have progressed favorably to the letter of their hopes, but the fact of one of the servants observing the footman squeezing the waist of the young lady in an ardent manner in a dark corner of the hall gave rise to a not unnatural suspicion. So the servant, who was a trusty, humble friend of the family, instead of going down stairs, and making a talk among the other servants, went quietly upstairs and whispered what she had seen to her mistress. The prevalence of wise judgment led to a policy of silence, accompanied by strict observation. Pretty soon the truth come out when the pair were followed and found together in the East Side room.

"You may bet your boots there was a row; but discretion is at a premium in that household, and there was one end in view, which was to avoid scandal. How did they do it? In this manner: The screws were put on the footman until he shook in his shoes. His conception of law was vague, and he was led to imagine that he had committed an offense which might incarcerate him for a lifetime. He was quickly reduced to a condition of willingness to do anything and everything. The girl had some very energetic and determined friends, you know. And then a good stout check payable to bearer was placed in the hand of the quaking youth, when he was told that the antipodes yearned for him; that his passage would be paid to some point in Australia.

He accepted the terms without a murmur, although it may be said to his credit that he asked permission to say goodbye to his young wife. He didn't obtain the boon.

"The little Miss, or rather Mrs. cut up a bit rough at first. She was too immature, however, to entertain a lasting sentiment, and absence makes the heart grow cold, you know.

"The family handled the thing so that no one knew of what had taken place. No one, did I say? Well I ought to change that and put in Pinafore style—scarcely anybody. I knew of it, for one.

"The divorce was gotten on the ground of desertion. They sent her out west to live with somebody who could be trusted, and finally the decree was obtained."

"What did the girl say?"

"By Jove! she had forgotten about the footman. She is 'out' now and a general favorite. They say young—— admires her greatly. You see, there is plenty of money all round. Ah! well, so the world goes. But I can't help thinking of the poor devil who was shipped off to Australia."

A Good Fellow.

From the Detroit Free Press.

Didn't know Rodgers, did you—Abraham Rodgers, g. g. f.; which means general good fellow? Well, I did, and helped bury him yesterday.

When I first met Rodgers he was a young man of 18, and the title of good fellow had already settled upon him. If they wanted the old church swept for Sunday, or the bell rung for prayer meeting, some one asked Rodgers to do it. If any old Hunker fell sick and hankered for rabbit soup, Rodgers was asked to go out and hunt for the rabbit. If any old woman wanted sassafras root or herbs, Rodgers was the good fellow who'd go to the fields and woods on her errand. No one ever thought of offering him money in payment for his time, and it is only his due to say that he wouldn't have accepted it if they had. He was expected to pound down the nail-heads in the sidewalks, replace broken planks, have an eye on the bridge, paint the school house steps, replace the broken glass in the church, and be the guardian of all bad boys, and no one ever heard him kick.

Later on old man Jackson fell sick, and when watchers were required he expressed his desire to have Rodgers come to the house and stay. Rodgers went, put in sixteen days and nights of hard work, and when the old man died the widow feelingly exclaimed:

"Oh, Abraham, but you are a noble young man! I can never, never repay you!"

She never did—never even offered him the value of a pair of stockings, although she was left $30,000.

Then Aunt Nancy Lee fell sick and died, and Rodgers had just begun his day's work as a carpenter when one of the Lee boys rode up with the news and added:

"And the very last thing she said was that you must be chief pall-bearer. Aunt Nancy always loved you, and you must come."

Rodgers went. Aunt Nancy forgot to say that he should be paid for his day's work, although she left $12,000 to the heathen, and so Rodgers was out again. He had scarcely settled down to work when some one discovered that the old hand fire engine which had been stowed away for six years ought to be put in condition. A leading citizen suggested to Rodgers to go ahead and fix the old tub up, and his bill should be paid by a subscription. Rodgers tinkered away for a week and a leading grocer gave him a bar of soap and a drygoods man came down with a roll of tape. The effort to reward him died out with that.

Rodgers lived just that sort of a life until he was 40 years old. He even put off getting married to sit up with a sick horse and be rewarded with a thank you. In one year he was pall-bearer at twenty-two funerals, and sat up with fourteen different dead people. When he worked for pay people paid him when they got ready. When there came a week in which somebody did not want him to compound a salve, repair a tub, sit up with a corpse, subscribe for a mill-dam, railroad or public hall, or give a day's work to public improvement or charity, Mrs. Rodgers felt that the judgment day could not be far off. He had put in three weeks looking up widow Davis' lost cow, digging roots for widow Jenkins and sitting up with Elder Smith, when Judge Froth suddenly died. Of course his last words were;

"I fall in the service of my country, and I want Abraham Rogers to be chief boss at my funeral. I will and bequeath my $75,000 to my wife, and I leave my thanks to Abraham."

Rodgers bossed the funeral. He borrowed all the chairs, got the singers together, formed the funeral procession, and rode two miles to the grave in a pouring rain to stand with uncovered head. Next day he was ill, and yesterday, as I told you, I helped bury him. When he died he hadn't a dollar in the house. He had selected cemetery lots for fifty people, but he had none of his own. He had helped to put as many into caskets, but he was buried in a plain coffin, at the expense of his friends. Very few of his friends turned out, as they were busy with their work. He had formed funeral processions half a mile long for squires, elders, deacons and judges, but there were only four vehicles in his. The clergyman seemed to be in a hurry, the grave-digger was impatient for us to be gone, and as we turned away some one remarked:

The Chances.

Pembina Pioneer Express: Since the issue has been made free trade vs protection, at least two doubtful and pivotal states have been made republican for sure. These are New Jersey and Connecticut. This leaves the battle ground Indiana and New York. By the nomination of Harrison, Indiana has been made practically safe for the republicans, and this wins the battle without New York.

New York is the most dubious state of all to figure on. New York City is overwhelmingly democratic always, and the state at large is overwhelmingly republican. When New York state votes straight republican and democratic, without side issue, the majority in the state overbalances the majority in the city, and the whole state is counted for the republicans. At the last presidential election, the republicans were divided among themselves, mugwampism was rife and some of the best republicans were singeing their wings at Cleveland's civil cervice Jack-o-lantern. This year the republicans are united, most of the mugwamps have returned to the fold, and those who haven't are in a state of "innoctious desuetude." The free trade issue also strengthens the republicans against the democrats in this state.

In some ways the democratic party is also stronger; it is less affected by internal disaffection than usual; it has the whole force of government patronage on its side; it has the prestige of past victory, and it has an ally, the prohibition party, which will poll a strong vote this year for its candidate, Gen. Fisk.

Taken all in all; the New York fight will be a hot one and the chances about even for the success of either party; but when you make your bets remember that Indiana, plus either Connecticut or New Jersey, wins the day for the republicans without New York.

Of course there may be changes in other states, but if we grant that Cleveland's free trade doctrine will strengthen the democratic party in the west, it will for the same reasons weaken it in the east and south, with this difference that free trade doctrines are more liable to lose them states in the east and south, that have hitherto been democartic, than to gain them states in the west which have hitherto been republican.

As to the Pacific states, Oregon, the most doubtful of the range, has already spoken plainly and distiuctly. and Mr. Harrison's record on the Chinese question, over which the democrats were so elated, proves to be strongly in his favor. The outlook for Dakota's champion looks bright; the chances for victory are largely in our favor, and the campaign is opened with victory in sight.

The "Kid" Delegation.

Rock County Herald.

Notwithstanding the disfavor with which the Pioneer Press regarded Minnesota's representatives in the national convention, the "kid" delegation, as it was commonly called, because of the youth of most of its members, made a record in every way creditable, and one which no one of them, with the possible exception of Hartly, of Duluth, who seconded the nomination of Depew, would not be glad to have subjected to the closest scrutiny. Senator R. B. Langdon, of Minneapolis, voted for Gen. Alger on every ballot, and did so no doubt, in the belief that he was acting wisely. Eleven of the delegates—Messrs. Davis, Heatwole, Edwards, O'Brien, Edgerton, Lewis, Steenerson, Freany, Johnson, Leland and Miller, voted for Judge Gresham on the first three ballots. and on the fourth ballot the vote was divided between Gresham and Harrison. It was the conviction of these eleven that the nominee should come from Indiana, and Harrison, accordingly, was their choice, Their record at the convention is one which reflects credit alike upon themselves and upon the state. They labored faithfully, conscientiously and zealously to carry out the wishes of their constituents, but they did so not so much for the purpose of winning credit at home as for the higher purpose of winning credit with themselves—of satisfying the highest demands of the convictions of duty. It is simply justice to these men to say that they represented their constituents fairly and honestly and failed in no particular to justify the confidence reposed in them. Although the delegation was made up of men who have not heretofore been prominent in state politics, it fell to the lot of one of the youngest of these "kid" delegates—F. F. Davis, of Minneapolis,—to win distinction for the state by an oratorical effort which certainly has never been equalled by any one of the delegates to previous conventions whose election the Pioneer Press has deigned to approve.

Sauk Centre Herald: Harrison's nomination insures not only a united canvas by the party in his behalf but his personal spotlessness of his tried integrity eliminates from the campaign those unpleasant features of personality which are too often blemishes on the face of American politics. He will arouse a degree of enthusiasm wholly unknown since the memorable campaign of 1860, when the republicans wrested the goverment from the hands of the rebellious democracy. What his grandfather did in 1840, and again Lincoln in 1860, Gen. Harrison will do in 1888—relegate the democratic party to the minor place in national affairs.

A Campaign of Principles.

Duluth Tribune: This constant begging of votes for Cleveland on account of the charms of his young wife is a plain admission that he is not deserving of the suffrages of his fellow citizens on his own account. It was this apprehension of his unpopularity that led to the nomination of Thurman on the tail end of the ticket. It was this fear of Cleveland's inherent weakness which led to the grert hurrah for "the old Roman," and culminated in the adoption of Grand-Pa Thurman's nose wipe as the party colors and the campaign badge of the democracy. It was this alarm in the free trade camp which hurried the president's mother-in-law home from Europe, and which causes "Cousin Ben" to be interviewed and say so many foolish things of which the more sensible democrats are ashamed and which the more dignified democratic will not publish. It was this conscious weakness which caused a pack of baseless lies to be circulated about the republican candidate and which has sought, and is still seeking by every conceivable trick and device, to avoid the main issue of the campaign.

Months ago the democrats were boasting about the courage and statesmanship of Grover Cleveland and crying out that his annual message had rendered him a great popular idol, and that millions of people were fairly aching to get a chance to vote for him. Finally the people of one of the far-away Pacific States spoke, and from the valleys "where rolls the Oregon" came a sound louder than the dashings of that majestic river. That voice was one of rebuke to this great free trade apostle. Coming as it did to bring defeat where victory was expected, it demoralized the men who had been shouting so boastfully for a campaign of principles, and they immediately began to hedge on their love of principle and to cast about for side issues, it mattered not how many or how silly, so that they would be sufficient to make the people forget that this was to be a campaign of principles.

Yes, this is getting to be a great campaign of principles.

"He's All Right."

Rock County Herald.

This is the universal verdict among the republicans throughout the country respecting each of the nominees of the Chicago convention. All things conidered, the ticket, beyond a doubt, is the strongest and most acceptable that could possibly have been chosen. It stands squarely for American ideas, American institutions and American interests, and it represents in the character and record of the nominees the highest types of American patriotism, statesmanship and morality. Gen. Harrison is a representative American citizen whom every American citizen will delight to honor. His record as a private citizen is one which every mother in the land can take as a model for the emulation of her children, and his career in positions of public trust reveals in every page of its history an honesty of purpose, an obedience to convictions of duty and a dovotion to high conceptions of honesty in politics and loyalty to sound principles of public economy, which offer an unquestionable guaranty of his fitness and worthiness to occupy the most exalted position of public trust in the nation. He was a gallant soldier and served his country loyally at the time when heroes were at the front and men of quite a different mould sent substitutes. The quality of his patriotism was tested on the field of battle and every gallant soldier honors the record of his splendid service and brilliant achievements. True as steel in times which called for heroic deeds and great personal sacrifice, he was not less true in times of peace in his devotion to the highest welfare of the nation whose existence he had fought to preserve. As a statesman he is no less distinguished than as a soldier, and a careful scrutiny of his record in the United States senate will convince any candid man that the republican party has made no mistake in choosing Ben Harrison as its standard bearer. The nominees of the republican party are men whom every republican will cheerfully support. They will unite the party in all sections of the country, and a united republican party means certain republican victory in November.

Duluth Tribune: In 1840 when General Harrison defeated the democratic party, its standard bearer was that wily New York polician, Martin Van Buren. Like Cleveland, he had been elected once and was believed to be invincible, Gen. Harrison will give the present New York boss the same lesson in this year of grace, 1888.

Blue Earth City Post: Again the railroad corporations of Minnesota have been made to understand that the people have rights that even railroads are bound to respect. The Supreme court has recently decided that railway passengers are not obliged to pay fare unless provided with a seat, and that conductors have no right to put passengers off the train between stations.

Faribault Republican: Not the red bandana, but the stripes and stars, and it bears the names of men who by that sign will conquer—Harrison and Morton. Under that banner the republicans will go into the contest with an enthusism born of confidence in the justice of their cause and of the knowledge that their standard bearers are men of superior fitness and spotless character, whose records no political foreman can successfully assail.

The North Dakota Farmer, published at Jamestown, D. T., has been moved to Minneapolis and will hereafter appear as the Northwestern Agriculturist. The Farmer has always been a good paper and will no doubt continue to be in its new and wider field.

The Protection Idea.

Lake Superior News.

"The American idea of protection" is good and proper, but a tariff that does not work to the equal interest of all classes is not the American idea. A tax that takes from one to give to another does not protect.

Warren Register: The prohibition party of Marshall County was organized at Warren, June 15th last. Mr. Wells, the secretary of the prohibition state central committee, managed the business. He is a ready talker, but too long-winded and becomes tiresome "by reason of his much speaking." He is evidently in love with his own eloquence and smartness. Like his leader, St. John, whom he tries to imitate in style, he is specially vindictive toward the Grand Old Republican party, and has but little to say about the Democratic party. He devoted the most of his speech made in the evening at Court House Hall, to misrepresenting and ridiculing the Republican party, of which he claimed to have once been a member. The Register believes that the only line along which the battle of prohibition can be fought successfully, is the one on which prohibition was won in Maine, Iowa and Kansas, viz: By a submission of the question to a vote of the people, untrammeled by other issues and free from political entanglements. But this does not suit the objects and purposes of the leaders of the political prohibition party. It offers no opportunities for them to rake in the loaves and fishes, and they are no more proof against the emoluments and blandishments of place and power than their much abused brethren of other political parties. The prohibition party aided the election of a democratic president four years ago, and may do so again this year. The plea put forth by the leaders of the third party, that prohibition can be accomplished only through the success of a political party in control of the national government, we believe to be untenable and injurious to the cause of prohibition.

Minneapolis Evening Journal: If the Democrats ever had much satisfaction in the hope that the Gresham-Harrison rivalry would damage Harrison's chances in Indiana they are sure to be disappointed. The Republicans of Indiana were never more harmonious and determined and never so well organized as now. They are determined to carry the state and there is not much room for doubt now that they will do so.

Worthington Globe: The news of Harrison's nomination is received with universal favor by republicans, and corresponding disfavor by the democrats, while the prohibitionists are wrestling with the question whether it is better to vote for a Union general who is a clean, honest man, or an ex-confederate. It must be an awful dish of crow for the good, loyal men to vote for Brooks, but they do not have to, for they are offered something better without money and without price.

Duluth Tribune: During his term of office thus far Cleveland has vetoed 198 special acts of congress granting pensions to aged and infirm veterans or the widows or dependent parents of soldiers. Some of the executive documents accompanying the vetoes were couched in abusive and derisive language, and no better campaign material could be circulated among the old soldiers than a compilation of the brutal utterances of a large number of those pension veto messages.

Duluth Tribune: The charge that General Harrison is a cold and unsympathetic man can be sufficiently answered by citing the fact that at the battle of Peach Tree Creek he stripped the shirt from his shoulders and tore it into bandages for his wounded soldiers—the class of men whom Mr. Cleveland ridicules and denounces in his pension vetoes.

Warren Register: Geo. H. Taylor, an attorney from Moorhead, was in Warren on business the latter part of last week and, while he is a democrat and hopes for the election of Cleveland and Thurman, he is a warm friend of S. G. Comstock, our candidate for Congress, and is anxious to see him elected, and will vote for him himself. He also says that nearly every voter in Moorhead and an overwhelming majority in Clay County, regardless of political differences, will cast their votes for Mr. Comstock. Mr. Taylor says these things openly, and is willing to say them from the rostrom or in any other public manner. This is good evidence as to how Mr. Comstock stands at home, among those best acquainted with him, and his standing at home is usually a safe criterion by which to judge a man who has long been in public life, as has Mr. Comstock.

Interesting to All Writers.

Invaluable advice and hints for literary workers are given in the July number of "The Writer," (Boston). "The Evolution of a Plot." "The Author of 'The Leavenworth Case,'" "The Filing of Clippings," "Type-Writer Commonplacing," and "New York as a Literary Field," are the titles of a few of the bright and sensible articles in the magazine. Short story writers might well take a hint from an editorial note which says: "So great is the difficulty of securing good short stories that the supply does not nearly equal the demand. The Writer's Literary Bureau has a standing order for stories not to exceed two thousand words, and for stories of six thousand words, for which good prices are offered; but, although the need has been extensively advertised, only a small part of the number required can be furnished. If American writers would neglect poetry and novel writing for a time, and devote their energies to short story-writing, they would make more money than they are making now." The Writer is edited by Wm. H. Hills and Robert Luce, two practical and experienced Boston newspaper men, and the price of the magazine is only ten cents a copy, or one dollar a year. Life Out of Doors.

This hot weather prompts one to flee from the sun's rays and seek the fresh air and cooling breezes beneath the roofs that were first known to man, that is to say, under the trees. In the July number of The American Garden are bright and timely articles on the tree question, and company out-of-doors, which covers this ground in delightful fashion. The writers argue with fact and fancy that the only true way to live in clear weather in summer time is in this "house not made with hands," surrounded by trees, shrubs and flowers upon the cool green carpet underneath. Bye the bye this American Gargen magazine is a pleasant thing for summer reading and we can highly recommend it to the novel-tired lounger, and likewise to practical people for its great mass of valuable information on gardening topics. The subscription price is only $1 a year, though it is said to cost as much to print it, with its beautiful illustrations, as many of the $2 and $3 magazines. Its office is at 751 Broadway, New York, and probably can be procured from any newsdealer.

There was a large number of very happy people assembled at the school house, in district No. 104, to witness the marriage of Dedrick M. Hanson to Karen A. Ericson. Rev. B. Anderson performed the ceremony. The wedding supper was given at the residence of John Aagard, and everything was done for the entertainment of the guests, all of whom wish them many happy, prosperous years. We extend our congratulations.

Two young women of Ada, who took a Pullman car at that place for Crookston, on the 4th, did not show very good breeding when a party of ladies and gentlemen from this place entered the car. We hope they will be more ladylike hereafter.

While P. J. Carey and wife were returning from Crookston on the Fourth, their only child had his hand under the window of the car, and the starting of the car shut the window and put two of the little fellow's fingers out of joint.

A series of revival services will begin on July 15th at the Beltrami school house, conducted by Rev. Warren, of Fertile, assisted by other clergymen from that place. EDNA.

B. J. Holstad was up from Neilsville on Tuesday. Reports not much being done in the political field as yet. In the vegetable kingdom, however, much has been accomplished, as the early and the latter rain, with a judicious intermingling of the pleasant sunshine, has accomplished wonders, and the prospects are very bright for a big yield of No. 1 Hard.

Bleeding from the nose in children is not an uncommon event at this season of the year. A popular article on this subject, by Dr. J. B. Bissell, in the July number of Babyhood, will therefore be found of general interest to mothers. It clearly describes the various causes of bleeding, and furnishes a number of simple remedies not always known or thought of. Equally seasonable is Dr. Chapin's article on "Dietetic Treatment of Indigestion and Diarrhœa," containing many hints which, if heeded, will save unnecessary suffering to the little ones. Dr. Yale, the medical editor, lays stress on the value of sterilizing milk, a process which deprives it of the living organisms that favor fermentation. The process is a very simple one and is fully described. Among the non-medical articles is one entitled "Put Yourself in Her Place," which discusses the nurse girl question in a novel way, the failings of the average mother rather than of the average nusse being pointed out as one of the principal obstacles in the way of a satisfactory solution of this perplexing question. Other topics treated of are "Prompt Cure of Crying Spells," "Midday and Extra Morning Naps," "Fastening Down Projecting Ears," "Injury to the Eyes from Veils," "A Baby's First Words," "Instances of Remarkable Memory," etc., etc. 15 cents a number; $1.50 a year. Babyhood Publishing Co., 5 Beekman St., New York.

The novel of the season which is calculated to make everybody talk about it is "The Doctor's Mistake," by Charles Howard Montague and Clement Milton Hammond. Mr. Montague is known as the auther of "Two Strokes of the Bell," and even more widely as the "exposer" of Washington Irving Bishop in the mind-reading sensation of a year ago. "The Doctor's Mistake" is a weird and curious story. There are but four characters in it and they are whirled along to a most unexpected climax in which the soul of one passes into the body of the other. "The heroine," says the New York Sun, "is one of the most unique and hideous characters to be found in fiction." The doctor, her guardian, is a scientist with the theological views of Robert G. Ingersol and the hero is a well-meaning man, strong in the faith of his ancestors. These are the two whose personality gets so strangely mixed in the end. It is a question whether the materialistic arguments advanced by Dr. Lowenthal in the course of the work are intended to be overthrown wholly or only in part by the unexpected ending. And that is just why discussion and argument follow in its wake wherever it is read. It is certainly startling enough and novel enough to warrant a second reading. It is published by Thomas Downey, Jr. & Co., Globe Building, Boston, in cloth at $1 per copy.

The Phrenological Journal and Science of Health, for July, opens with a notable man, not one of the presidential candidates, for it will have something about them in its August edition, but Dr. N. S. Davis, of Chicago, who is one of our best known and really progressive physicians. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, the author, is also discussed and illustrated. So is Sir Morell Mackenzie, the English specialist who was so long in attendance upon the late Emperor Frederick. One of the more prominent of colored lawyers receives a notice. His name is C. H. J. Taylor. A note on the Pathology of written language is a curious item of physiology. Funerals, Mourning Robes, and such like, is a sensible demand for moderation. An Early Bird; or, An Early Worm, is a capital pen portrait of a character met with in rural districts. Frederick of Germany is an appreciative sketch of a noble, heroic character. The writer of "Nerves" evidently knows what they are and gives capital advice about them. The reader of this number will be pleased by its variety of topic and the useful entertainment he will get from it. In every respect seasonable and suitable from first to last with pages that will please the youngest reader. Price 20 cents; subscription $2.00 per year. The publishers offer it the balance of this year, six months, "on trial" for only 75 cents. Address Fowler & Wells Co., Pubs., 777 Broadway, N. Y.

Some Fables--After AEsop.

Farm, Stock and Home.

A politician and a farmer about to journey together agreed to stand by each other in any dangers that might befall. They had not gone far before a savage bear rushed out of a thicket and stood in their path. The politician—a light nimble fellow—got up into a tree; the farmer fell flat on his face. The bear came and smelled of him, thought him dead, and went off again into the woods. The politician then came down from the tree and asked the farmer what wonderful secret the bear had whispered in his ear. "He told me," said the farmer, "to care for myself in the future, and not put any confidence in any such cowardly rascals as you are."

⁂

A Man passing along the road in winter, came across an Office Seeker half starved and cold. He took pity on him and invited him to go to his home. On their way the Office Seeker kept blowing on his fingers. "Why do you do that?" said the Man who had seen little of the world. "To warm my hands, they are nearly frozen," said the Office Seeker. Arriving at his home, the Man poured out a mess of smoking pottage and set it before the Office Seeker, who at once commenced blowing at it with all his might. "What, blowing again!" cried the Man, "is it not hot enough?" "Yes," answered the Office Seeker, "it is too hot and that is the reason why I blow at it." "Be off with you!" said the Man, "I will harbor no man who can blow hot and cold from the same mouth."

⁂

A Protectionist and a Man once journeyed together. The Man was a simple creature, scarcely seeing beyond his own nose; while the Protectionist, like most of his kind was a master at knavery. They were led by love of gain into a deep hole. When their desires were gratified the Protectionist, who had got much the largest share, said: "Securing this gold is all very well, but it wont get us out from here; you had better stand against the wall, then by the aid of your broad shoulders I can get out, and once out, of course I can help you." "That is a splendid plan!" cried the Man, "I should never have thought of that. How I wish I had your brains, to be sure!" The Protectionist, having got out in the way described, began to rail at his companion: "Make the most of your patience, old fellow," said he, "for you will need it all. If you had half as much brains as strength, you would never have gone down there. I am sorry I can't stay longer with you; but I must go, spend my money and have a good time. So good bye." The Man, who was a farmer, is still in the hole.

Coal in the United States.

Farm, Stock and Home.

A report on the production of coal in the United States for 1887, and its value at the mouth of the mines, by a special government agent, has just been made public. The total production of coal was 123,965,250 tons; its value—which, of course, includes the "high" wages paid to miners and other laborers—was $173,580,936, or about $1.40 a ton. Pennsylvania supplied over 70,000,000 tons; of this amount 39,506,255 tons were anthracite, valued at $2 00 a ton, and 30,866,602 bituminous, valued at 88 cents. Ohio mined 10,801,700 tons, all bituminous, valued at about 90 cents a ton, and Illinois mined 10,278,890 tons, all bituminous, valued at about $1 50 a ton. The balance of the output is divided between the other states and territories, ranging from nearly 5,000,000 tons in West Virginia, down to 500 tons in Idaho.

The difference between the prices given above and those paid by the consumers represent the cost of carriage and profits of dealers, and we confess that it looks as though they got infinately more of the people's money, proportionately, than do the laborers in whose sole behalf there is a duty of 75 cents a ton. The anthracite coal of Pennsylvania is practically at Philadelphia's back door, yet the retail price in that city was from $5 50 to $7 00 a ton during the year. To the price in this region during the same time lean and empty pocket books bear melancholy witness.

The strangest part of this business is that mine owners, coal carrying rail roads, and coal merchants everywhere say there is no money in the coal business. Consumers know that there is very little coal in the money business, and thus the conviction is forced upon us that our princely paid, tariff protected laborers are pocketing all the swag. In the meantime the tariff on coal is untouched by the reformers.

Farm, Stock and Home: We fail to see why would be statesmen should declaim, rave, tear quills from the American eagle, spit blood and do several other ridiculous in opposition to free flax. The claim that Canadian flax would ruin the flax growing interests in the United states is based on the assumption that labor is cheaper in the former than in the latter country, which is false; that land is more productive there than here, which is false; that Canadian farmers are more skilful and industrious than ours, which is false; that they raise better flax, which is false; and therefore the claim that free flax will make lower prices here is false. If Northwestern farmers can trade free flax and free wool for free lumber, free binding twine, free salt, free coal, free iron, etc., and lessened duties on thousands of manufac tured articles, it will prove to be a million times better than any horse trade ever made by anyone of them.

Brains Bring Success.

Hoard's Dairyman.

A great many farmers who are dairymen to the extent of keeping ten to thirty cows, for the sake of their milk, are still in bondage to a low, false standard in their business. They have little or no ambition to become bright, successful dairymen. They have an idea that it will not pay them to cultivate their brains: that if they should pay out a dollar or two for a dairy paper, it would be money thrown away; that reading, study and a good bright mind have nothing to do with success in the dairy business; that all there is to it is to drudge along with their eyes on the ground, and think and know as little as possible.

We say that this is their way of looking at the business. The proof of our assertion that they are just that kind of men, is the fact that they live in that way and the Bible says: "As a man thinketh, so is he." There lies the secret of their being just what they are. It is the kind of thinking they are doing. First, they lack sound dairy knowledge. They dont think they need any. If you converse with them about matters that every well posted dairyman knows about, they will either stare at you blankly, or look as if they did not believe a word you say, or say they have heard something about it from somebody. They do not seem to have any ambition to be well posted. They don't care even a dollar's worth to know what are considered the ideas and best methods for winning success out of the dairy business. If an institute is held right under their nose they will not attend. They seem to be as afraid as death that they will know a little more next year than they do this.

What shall be done to reach this class and lift them up out of their mucky ideas of conducting a dairy business. There is a vast number of such farmers in all the dairy districts of the United states and Canada.

They rest like a dead weight on the wings of all progress. They are blind to all reading, deaf to all argument, or entreaty, and seem joined to the idol of an unprofitable way of doing things.

They do not lack brains so much as they lack all ambition to use what they have. The Dairyman has always striven to reach this class and convince them, if possible, that there was a large profit to them in reaching out for a more intelligent way of thinking and doing. The welfare of country and state is largely dependent upon the progress of the many, not a few. In every community can be found bright, intelligent farmers, who make a large success of the business. But their neighbors live on in their old ways as unconsious of the better way as though they were asleep. The late Charles H. Phillips, of Lake Mills, Wis., amassed a fortune of $100,000 in straight farming, in twenty-eight years. His methods, though they brought a fortune to him, had scarcely any effect on his neighbors for years. Man after man among them we heard sneer at Phillips for his "gimcrack ideas,, but the next we knew they had sold out to him and gone west to sneer and sell out again. Reading and studying made him a prosperous man, for he was unable to perform manual labor. A lack of reading and use of their brains forced many of his neighbors to sell out. Is it not time to look at this business in the right light?

Does Dairying Pay?

Under the above heading in the Ohio Farmer is the following sensible article which was written by a person who signs himself "A. D. M.," Hudson, O. In our estimation this gentleman has a correct idea of dairying and backs up what he says by figures.

"This is the great question of the day in the dairy section, and it almost invariably receives the answer, emphatically, 'no.' But I am ready to say 'yes,' and will produce the proof of my position. I admit that not one in a great many are making a success of it, but the fact remains unchanged. The fault does not rest with the business, but lies in the shiftless way in which it is followed, or rather, allowed to run its self. One has only to take a close survey of the business as it is now conducted in our midst, to convince the most skeptical that this is true. The time has gone by (and I am glad of it) when men can make a living, not to say money, by idling about with hands in pockets, at corners of streets and groceries, running down their more enterprising neighbors. Such persons always have plenty of money with which to procure filthy tobacco for personal defilement, making them more and more unfit to even milk cows, not to say for human society. Of course they cannot afford to attend a farmers' institute or take and read a good dairy paper; oh, no; "hard times."

I saw, in regard to grain and dairy farming, that the latter pays best, as near as I can find out from some of the first class grain farmers and comparing their reports with what I have actually done. One of the best grain farmers in my county, and he is one of our commissioners, told me that the average cash receipts from a 100-acre grain farm this year were $600. If this be true, give me the dairy farm. I have a farm of 105 acres that I work myself as far as man's help is concerned, except in haying and sugar making time, when I hire a man by the day. I keep sixteen cows and milk them all myself, for I am one of those men who think the good wife and daughters have no place in the cow barn, and following is the result of my year's work from New Years 1887, around to Jan. 1, 1888. The cows were the same, no change being made in the twelve months:

Milk sold, pounds	105,368
Average to the cow, pounds	6,585
Daily yield per cow, pounds	18
Total for milk	$1,128 43
Average per head	70 53
Paid for grain	245 70
Net profits	883 40
Average per cow	55 21

We have had besides all the milk for family use that was wanted and had three small children. My cows are of no particular breed, but most of them I have raised. I have no silo or bank barn, but hope to have both. I milk the year round. At all times some cow is dry. I have not saved up my farm resources for one big year's yield, but I have received from 16 cows on an average for the last three over 6,550 pounds, of milk per cow' and the profit has been—first year, $54.14; second year, $56.17; this year $55.21. I don't claim to be smarter than any other fellow, but I am sure that nine-tenths of the dairymen can get just as large a yield as I have done if they would work more and complain less. Farmers can improve the times by helping themselves more. It is said that the "gods help them who help themselves," and one way I find to do this is by increasing my production. When prices go down I make up for it by increasing the quality and quantity."

The project which has been much discussed of having a grand reunion of all the Scandinavian soldiers of the late war is likely to be carried out in Minneapolis September 19th as committees have been appointed and the preliminary arrangements all made looking toward that end. The Exposition will then be open that a special programme will be prepared which will aid in entertaining the guests of the occasion.

REPUBLICAN TICKET.

For President,

Of New York.
For Member of Congress, 5th District,
SOLOMON G. COMSTOCK,
Of Clay and Polk Counties.

A Poor Quality of Reform.

Minneapolis Evening Journal.

The discussion of the sugar tariff in the house yesterday and the defeat of of an amendment from the Republican side to reduce the sugar tax from 82 per cent to 41 per cent, instead of leaving it at 68 per cent, as the Mills bill now proposes, resulted to the decided advantage of the Republicans. There is no protected product upon which the "inequalities of the tariff" are so glaring as in the tariff on sugar, or which is so undeserving of the protection afforded.

The "inequality" is suggested very vividly by the fact that the tax inflicts upon the country an expense of about $60,000,000 a year on imported sugars. The money goes to the government but the government has no use for it. The injustice of the tax which imposes such a burden lies in the fact that the industry is an unprogressive one and necessarily limited to a small area. For the sake of making it possible for a few planters to raise and manufacture about one-tenth of the sugar we consume the country is expected to pay an enormous tax on the other nine-tenths. It would be defensible if there were any prospect that by the aid of protection we might develop the sugar industry up to the point of supplying the home demand, but there is no such possibility.

Sugar should be placed on the free list. Mr. Nelson's free sugar bill was the simplest as well as the best tariff bill yet offered. The Republicans have also proposed to reduce the sugar tariff by dividing it in the middle. Both propositions have been rejected by the majority, and the Louisiana planters have compromised with the Democratic leaders on a reduction to 68 per cent.

The Republicans were on the right track yesterday, and at the same time occupied a position consistent with their advocacy of the principle of protection. The Democrats, for the sake of holding their Louisiana votes, surrendered their principles and the nakedness of their subserviency to political profit and sectional interest was exposed before the whole country. The kind of tariff reform which was exhibited by the professed reformers yesterday is not well calculated to command public confidence and respect.

The Proof is Wanted.

Todd County Argus.

The Princeton Union does not believe the story of Mr. Gilman's alleged treachery in the St. Cloud convention and demands the proof at the hands of those who profess to know so much about the intrigue of that convention. The following article from the Union is in answer to the Sauk Centre Herald's strictures on Mr. Gilman. The Herald must now produce its proof:

Mr. Barto had twenty-six votes in the convention that he could depend upon, and he needed twenty-four more. Will the Herald please inform us where Mr. Barto expected to get the necessary twenty-four votes, and how, in the name of common sense, Mr. Gilman could have, had he felt so disposed, prevented Mr. Barto from being nominated? Buckman's friends would never have gone to Barto, Stearns' friends felt the same way, from the start, Comstock's friends were aware of the fact that they had the inside track and they were in the race to stay, more especially as their man was the second choice of about every delegate in the convention. It was from Corliss that Barto expected to gain accretions to his strength, and, had Corliss' support left him, eight of the fifteen would have gone to Comstock. The writer knew this at the time, and since then we have talked with several prominent Otter Tail County men with the result of further convincing us in the belief that Barto could not have secured half of Corliss' strength. Had Gilman been in hades, Mr. Comstock would have been nominated just the same.

The Sauk Centre Herald is a respectable newspaper and its editor is a gentleman, hence we are surprised at the accusations made in its columns against Mr. Gilman. We have a proposition to make the Herald; Produce the proof, not simply assertions and hearsay evidence, but facts and figures, that Mr. Gilman proved false to Mr. Barto, or that Mr. Gilman, by word or deed, influenced a single vote against Mr. Barto and the Union will forever after hold its peace as far as Mr. Gilman is concerned. Give us the proof and we will be convinced.

Douglas County News: Mr. and Mrs. Geo. H. Reynolds returned to St. Cloud from Denver Monday night. Mrs. Reynolds stood the trip very well but is in a very precarious condition.

Duluth Evening Herald: In a speech in 1887, General Harrison, the soldier statesman, referred to Cleveland's pension vetoes as "poisoned arrows." He said, defending the pension bill: "Why, it is something like the old rule we had in the army; as long as a man was able, he marched and carried his own gun and knapsack, but when he got hurt or sick, and fell out, we had an ambulance to put him in, and that is the principle embodied in this bill, that we, the survivors of the late war, as long as God gives us strength and health, will march in this column of civil life, making our own living and carrying our own burden, but here is a comrade falling by the way, sickness, casualty—not his own fault—and he has to fall out; we want the great national ambulance to take him up."

Todd County Argus: Democrats are fond of asserting their inability to see how the Republicans of the West who favor a reduction of the tariffs can support the nominees of the Chicago convention who stand upon a platform that pronounces for high protection. Many prominent Republicans of this state are not in full accord with the tariff plank of the Republican platform, but they have little to hope for from the Democrats. The late St. Louis convention reaffirmed the platform of 1884, and though they have had full control of the government since 1884 they have done nothing to relieve the accumulating surplus in the treasury. We believe that the protection doctrine as set forth in the Republican platform is deeply rooted in the people and will win. But the day is near at hand when the people will learn that protection favors the few at the expense of the many.

War on the Trusts.

Evening Journal.

The attorney general of New York declares that the Sugar Trust is illegal and a public nuisance, and he proposes action for a judicial settlement of the question. The result will have importance as bearing not only on the Sugar Trust, but on the Oil Trust and on all similar monopolies.

There seems little doubt that the result will be unfavorable to the monopolies. In several states the courts have already decided that such combinations are conspiracies in restraint of trade and are illegal. In the salt monopoly case, in Ohio, the court held that the clear tendency of such an agreement "is to establish a monopoly and to destroy competion in trade, and for that reason, on the grounds of public policy, the courts will not aid in its enforcement." In fact this has been an accepted principle of common law ever since the decision of Lord Coke in the "case of the monopolies." Coke declared that a monopoly led to three results: An increase in price, a decrease in quality, and the impoverishment of artisans and others.

There seems ground for hope that a way may be opened by the New York authorities for the application of this sound principle of law to these modern devices of monopoly—the various Trusts. The people are not helpless, and law is their weapon.

Where the Trouble is.

Evening Journal: The conference held yesterday between the railroad commisioners, the railroad managers, the Farmers' Alliance executive committee and other citizens developed some interesting facts. In Mr. Hill's comparative statement of grain rates it appears that after passing the limit of 200 miles distance, the rates on the Manitoba to Duluth are from one to two cents less than to Minneapolis and St. Paul—a fact which the objectors to existing rates seem to forget very easily notwithstanding its frequent reiteration from the cities discriminated against. Mr. Hill also submitted a tabulated statement of tonnage, of rates per mile, of revenue received and the annual reduction for eight years ending June 30, 1888, from which it appears that the tonnage has grown from 93,330,924 to 585,000,000 tons carried one mile, that the rate has decreased from 2.84 a ton to 1.24 cents, and that the amount of revenue has been reduced from year to year in a constantly increasing sum from what it would have been if the rate of 2.84 cents had been maintained—the reduction amounting for last year to $8,471,258.15, while the actual revenue received was only $7,290,741.82, or over a million less than half of what it would have been if the rates had not been reduced. It also appeared that the sum saved to the public by this reduction amounted in the aggregate to $32,583,654.24. The total revenue during that period was, in round numbers, $45,000,000.

The executive committee of the Alliance asked of the railroad commission, in their formal statement of grievances, that the people of the state should be relieved of unjust railroad charges to the extent of $8,000,000 annually, and yet by the statement of the president of that Manitoba road, the saving to the people on acount of the reduction in rates since 1881 amounted on that road alone, to over $8,000,000 last year.

All these figures seem to indicate a disposition to be fair and appear to mean what they say. But still they are not satisfactory, because the public has no means of knowing what they are based on. The public does know that careful estimates place the fictious railroad stock of the country at over $400,000,000 and that the railroad companies have tried to make the people pay dividends on it, just the same as if it represented actual investment. The result is that the people have become very suspicious of all representations in any way depending upon capitalization as a basis and will always be as long as it is possible to water the stock of public corporations of this character holding franchises from the state and under obligations to the people to account for the uses they make of granted privileges. The issuance of millions of fictious stock and the efforts to collect dividends on it from the public is the gigantic fraud which is at the bottom of nearly all the trouble between the railroads and the people, and when some way has been discovered by which to squeeze the water out and prevent the absorption of any more a long step will have been taken toward a final and and satisfactory settlement of the rail road problem.

Cleveland's Vetoes of Pension Bills.

Sauk Rapids Sentinel: An old soldier was in our sanctum a short time since, and wanted to know if there was a democrat in the land who was a true federal soldier who could consistantly vote for Grover Cleveland for another term as president of these United States after he had vetoed the pension bills, and had exhibited such willingness to return to the rebels the battle flags which so many had shed their blood, and lost their lives to capture? And then he asked, do they think he would have vetoed said bills if they had called for pensions for Rebel Soldiers? The only answer we gave him was that the questions should be laid before the readers of the Sentinel, many of whom are democrats—and then any one desires can reply through the columns of the Sentinel.

Money in Good Cattle Yet.

Breeder's Gazette.

Those intimately connected with the cattle market and supposed to understand as well as anybody can understand the influence which control it are predicting a still further advance in values, and nine cents has been named by some as a not impossible figure for the best. And while this extreme figure may not be reached the reasons advanced in favor of a better range of prices seem to be well taken, and there is little doubt that henceforth the market will be characterized by a stronger feeling and something of an improvement in values. High prices are very desirable, but even if they are not realized there will be no difficulty or lack of profit in producing good cattle at present prices. But they must be good. All along through the recent protracted depression the prices of good cattle have been fairly well maintained, and if the market had not been continually overborne by offerings of inferior cattle in excess of the demand they would have been still better sustained. It has been these inferior grades of cattle which have been selling at prices below the cost of production and disturbing the cattle industry from one end of the country to the other, and if there has been any real complaint of a lack of profit in the production of good cattle it has been rather due to the high price and scarcity of feed than to the prices they realized on sale. The prices of feed have ruled high at a time when the market was unfavorably overborne by this rush of inferior stock, and of course profits were largely diminished. Had feed been in its usual abundance and borne its normal value the producers of good cattle would have made money at the lowest prices which have prevailed for that class of cattle at any time during this trying period.

It is not often that they will be called upon to face such a combination of disadvantages, no matter how wide the fluctuation which may occur in the market. The production of good cattle may therefore be regarded as an eminently safe and profitable business, while inferior cattle, at no time grown to any considerable profit, are certain to frequently meet with such market conditions as involve their producer in actual loss. And good cattle are just as easily produced upon the farm if the farmer sets his face that way as are inferior cattle. One cause of failure, and in fact the principal one where good keep is provided, is in the use of bulls which are not themselves good. Many farmers are satisfied, and seem to think they have done all that is necessary when they buy a bull with a pedigree and eligible for record or already recorded in the herd books. But here is where they miss it.

It needs a good bull to sire good calves, and no scrawny, inferior animal—no matter if he does happen to be a pure-breed according to the books and boasts a pedigree—can be depended upon to produce such calves. The selection of a bull to grade up and improve the farm cattle and produce calves that command the top of the market is an important matter and should be attended to with the greatest of care, even as much as if he were intended for use in a pure-bred herd. The cullings at some breeder's sale of bulls which should have been steered soon after they were born, from among which, we regret to say, many farmers make their selections because they are cheap, are not good enough, although far preferable to scrubs, to raise good grades which can be fed for the highest prices and the greatest profit.

An exquisit portrait of Helen Keller, the wonderful little deaf and dumb blind girl of Alabama, is the frontispiece of July Wide Awake; and Sallie Joy White, in an illustrated article, "The Story of Helen Keller," gives details about this marvelous child that will interest old and young, school-children and metaphysicians. Another very delightful piece of biography is the Monroe chapter in "The Children of the White House," the fine Presidential series which has been so long preparing for Wide Awake. Very little has ever been given to the public concerning President Monroe's two beautiful daughters, Eliza and Maria, but for this paper the most interesting matter has somehow been unearthed. Eliza was educated in Paris at Madame Campan's famous school, where her intimate schoolmate was the future Queen of Holland, Hortense Beauharnais, the daughter of Josepaine, and the school life is most interesting reading; and as Mrs. Hay, in the White House, this same Eliza started most of the vexing questions in Washington etiquette—the entire chapter is piquant reading for everybody. Susan Coolidge has a fine old-world story, "Etelka's Choice." John Burroughs, in "How to Observe Nature," tells some of his charming secrets. Geraldine Butts has a beautiful illustrated four-page ballad, "The Little Princess." Edward Everett Hale in "The Story of Boston Common" gives an account of "The Artillery Elections" when he was a boy. There is a capital coin collector's story, "The Red, Red Copper." Mrs. Humphrey tells "How to Keep Mosquitoes Away." Oscar Fay Adams writes the biography of the great French fairy-story-teller and politician, Laboulaye. Mrs. Leonowens describes "The T'soug T'sing T'sue." In "Double Roses" Mrs. Sherwood draws a good picture of a fashionable New York rector and his parishioners, while Mrs. Crowninshield, in her serial, "Plucky Smalls: His Story," gives a rollicking experience among the boys on a training-ship and tells "how they executed Charlie Noble." Other delightful things "too numerous to mention." All for 20 cents. $2.40 a year. D. Lothrop Company Publishers, Boston, Mass.

CROOKSTON, MINN., JULY 19.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE CITY.

'Round Home.

J. T. Johnson represents the town of Tilden in the city this week.

Don't forget the great republican rally, at the Opera House, on Saturday evening next.

Judge Mills arrived on Monday's train and commenced the special term of court on Monday.

D. D. Williams was one of Red Lake Falls citizens in the ratification meeting on Monday evening.

Bro. C. C. Knappen, of the Fisher Bulletin, was up to the ratification meeting on Monday evening.

Mayer Hurlbut welcomed the arrival of his mother last week, who comes to visit with her son for awhile.

A. R. Holston, of Red Lake Falls, made a very favorable impression by his speech at the ratification meeting.

Charlie Rapp came down from St. Hilaire to ratify and exercise a fatherly care over Harry Ives, of the Spectator.

H. A. McClatchie was down from Red Lake Falls to lend the weight of his influence to the republican ratification on Monday evening.

His Honor, Judge Mills, took in the ratification meeting and seemed to enjoy the proceedings hugely. He says Comstock is a safe man to tie to.

Quite a number of our young people went out to Maple Bay last week. Mr. Graves and Mr. Maley and Misses Hattie and Cora Biyins composed one gay party.

The Thirteen Towns reports that the Fosston Lumber Co. lost their mill by fire last week, together with some lumber and shingles. Loss, above insurance, $1,000.

Rev. Elmer is one of the most enthusiastic Comstock men in the county. He will take off his coat and work for our nominee until he is triumphantly elected next fall.

All turn out to hear Congressman Horr, on Saturday evening, democrats, prohibitionists, and all. Remember the time and place—Saturday evening, at the Opera House.

Dot leetle Fisher Band won golden laurels at the ratification meeting on Monday night. Their visit was a treat highly appreciated and thoroughly enjoyed by our people.

Don't forget the auction sale at Berthiaume & Michaud's auction rooms on Saturday. A lot of fine stock will be sold, together with machinery and a lot of articles too numerous to mention.

The ladies of the Norwegian Lutheran church held an ice cream festival at the old post office building, on Broadway, on Tuesday evening. The hall was well filled during the whole evening and the receipts must have been encouraging.

Our people were very much pleased with the appearance of our next Congressman, Hon. S. G. Comstock, who does not appear to be the frightful object of total depravity which the democratic papers have tried to make him appear.

Dick Overholt was down from Mentor this week on business and pleasure combined. He thinks the people along the B. & N. W. are getting about discouraged waiting for the iron horse. Says crop prospects are booming but they need that road to handle the crop.

THE JOURNAL is in receipt of a handsome wedding card announcing the fact that F. J. Duffy, of the East Grand Forks Courier, was married at Watertown, Wis., on July 11th, to Miss Mary F. McCabe. The happy couple will pass the honeymoon among friends in Wisconsin, and in visiting New York, Boston, and other prominent points. They will be at home after Aug. 15th. THE JOURNAL adds its blessing and best wishes.

The subject of giving aid to a cornet band was brought up in the council on Tuesday evening and referred to the finance committee. The village of Fisher paid its band $200 a year for the first two or three years, bought the uniforms and instruments and retains control of the same. They now pay their band $100 a year and furnish a room. The city of Crookston could well afford to do as much, or more, and could easily get up a fine band of 24 pieces. We are told that the majority of the council favor giving aid to a band, and should this be done the council will deserve the thanks of all who feel the slightest interest in the progress of our city.

W. H. Standish the Bartlett, D. T., lawyer, was in the city last week and paid THE JOURNAL a visit. Mr. S. will be remembered as a farmer citizen of Polk County, living for a few years at Edna. He has taken a great deal of interest in the pine on the Red Lake Reservation, drafting a bill which was endorsed by the Dakota legislature. The bill provided for the acquisition of the pine and in such a way that the Government retains control of it until it passes into the hands of the settlers. By his plan the danger of the pine being gobbled up by pine land speculators is said to be obviated, in fact rendered impossible. Mr. S. has been very enthusiastic in the work having spent much time and thought upon the subject and visiting Washington in the interest of his plans.

Miss Hattie Thomas completed her term of school and returned to the city.

Mrs. I. U Jennings will sell Millinery at less than cost for the next twenty days.

Mrs. Bunnell, wife of engineer Bunnell, was in the city visiting with friends the past week.

Will Van Dyke started, on Saturday, for a fortnight's visit to his old home in Alexandria.

The republicans opened the campaign with a grand ratification meeting on Monday Evening. The opera house was packed.

H. H. Olson, of Grafton, has bought S. S. Johnson's building on Robert St. It will be occupied as now, by the drug store, Holand's gallery, and Olson's jewelry store.

Capt. Vaustrum was down from Hallock to attend the republican rally on Monday evening. He says look out for a big republican majority in Kittson County this fall.

C. W. Palmer arrived from Troy, N. Y., on Wednesday last. Says he finds crops looking exceedingly fine in the Red River Valley and business much better than he expected.

P. H. Konzen, the gifted County Superintendent of Kittson County, took in the ratification proceedings on Monday evening. He predicts the success of the entire republican ticket this fall.

Wile, Morris, Fuller, Thompson and Morrisey boarded Wednesday's train for Fargo, where they will represent the Crookston Club in the Tournament, which takes place to-day and to-morrow.

We have only one note and mortgage we make a loan the day applied for, charge no bonus, and make interest payable at our office in Crookston.

STEENERSON & MCMANUS.

Mr. Thomas Samson, a well known farmer in Hammond Township, lost a valuable horse last week. He had just returned home from town, and put the animal in the stable when it became cast, sustaining injuries which resulted in its death.

On Thursday last, Clarence Odell who has held the position of oiler in the saw mill since it first started, while standing near the shingle mill, was struck on the face across the eye by a stick from the saw, receiving a most painful cut. He was extremely fortunate to escape the the loss of an eye.

The police had their hands full, and the lockup as well, several evenings last week, dealing with a crowd of the box-car fraternity. On Thursday night they lodged twenty in the cooler who, when morning broke, declined work offered them, and acknowledged the advice Chief Hayes offered in the words of Horace Greely: "Go west." by taking that course.

We satisfy all our customers, we ask no bonus, and we pay over money on loans the moment notes are signed.

STEENERSON & MCMANUS.

A pleased smile again lights up the countenance of the Queen City Capitalist because of the intelligence that the Standard Oil Co. which has made this the distributing point of northern Minnesota, has surveyed ground, near their present site, for a large tank house which is to be built of brick, one story and basement. The result of the survey has been sent on to Bowers & Co., Fargo, who have contracted to do the building, and expect to break ground in the near future.

Mr. A. Anderson, editor of the Scandinavian, the oldest Norwegian paper published in America, is in the city, the guest of the Hon. B. F. Sampson. Mr. Anderson laughs at the parade the Globe made over what it calls the flop of the Norden to the democracy. Says the Norden editor is a mugwump, who worked for Cleveland in 1884 so that this sudden "change of heart" is four years old at least. As to the Norden's mighty influence it has by no means the "largest circulation" nor is it the "leading Norwegian paper" and what influence it has wielded has been for the democrats so long that it looks ridiculous to make such a great parade about it at this late day. It does not seem to take much to satisfy the Globe when it can find so much comfort in such "notable conversions.

We loan money to pay up railroad lands.

STEENERSON & MCMANUS.

About five minutes before six o'clock Saturday p. m., Jean Chandreau, who for three years has done faithful and efficient service, runing the shingle slab edger in the saw mill, struck his left hand against his saw, dismembering it of all fingers, except the first, including the thumb. He was at once taken to the office of Dr. Dunlop, who, assisted by Dr. Van Dyke, dressed the injured hand. Mr. Chandreau is worthy of sympathy, as he will henceforth be dependent upon his one remaining hand for the support of himself and two motherless children. His comrades at the mill have shown an admirable spirit in making up a subscription for him which already foots up $146.00. If it were not for its length, we would be glad to publish the list of subscribers. A few of those worthy of mention are:

Chas. Finnegan	(laborer).........	$5 00
John Finnegan	do	3 00
Geo. Truax	do	2 00
Clarence Odell	do	2 00
Martin Lally	(Foreman).........	2 00
Mr. Taylor	(of the firm).........	1 00

Although none gave large amounts, Mr. Caandreau knows each one gave "as he is prospered," and is duly grateful. The hand is doing well.

The Ratification Meeting.

If the Times man was not satisfied with the spontaneous burst of enthusiasm that found expression upon the receipt of the news of Harrison's nomination, when a few met on the corner of Main and Robert built a bonfire and spoke to a few hundred gathered there the sight that greeted his eyes on Monday evening must have fully convinced him that the republican party, that he has tried so hard to malign and abuse, did not expire when he turned his little coat and joined the ranks of the unterrified. Long before dark people began to arrive in squads and droves and at 8:30 there was standing room only at the opera house. Never in its history has that institution been more severely taxed than at this time. The meeting was called to order by J. G. McGrew, who, after a piece was sung by the Glee Club, introduced our nominee for Congress who in a calm and dispassioned manner talked about our candidates for president and vice president, comparing them with those of the democratic party. He then showed what the republican party had always done for the country and what the democrats had always promised to do but had not accomplished, showing that party to be a very promising party,—always promising but never performing. He showed how their action on the tariff question proves the insincerity of their promises to perform great things for the country. Referring to the charges that have been freely made in this city that "if Mr. Comstock is elected we shall have no hopes of securing the pine on the Red Lake Reservation during his term," Mr. Comstock said that he felt as deep a debt of obligation to Polk County whose delegation had not only rendered his nomination possible but had actually more influence toward securing it than any other one there, and who had only asked of him beforehand that, if elected, he would do all in his power to secure this desired end, that he had then and there pledged them his best efforts to this end and also in every other matter of local interest. The attitude of Polk County since then was one he was proud of and this rousing demonstration to-night confirmed all of his previous impressions and made him feel as though her interests were deserving as warm a place in his heart as his own county. He said that all Polk County will have to do is to signify her wishes and his most earnest efforts would be brought to bear upon the accomplishment of her wishes. He spoke about half an hour and no one could help but feel that the words to which he was listening were the words of a noble, honest and upright man; a man capable of representing the interests of this vast district truly and well. Mr. C. was followed by att'y A. A. Miller of this city in an earnest, eloquent presentation of the important issues of the hour. Mr. Miller is a very forcible speaker and held his hearers' attention well to the end of his discourse. Mr. Miller was followed by ex-Senator Halvor Steenerson who gave us some of the inside workings of the Chicago convention and the doings of the "kid delegation" in that convention. Having talked in court all day he was hardly in condition to do himself ample justice "but he got there all the same" with feet and hands. Judge Montague followed in his maiden speech in the cause, which was conceded to be a good one, though his former democratic brethren disliked very much to see him speaking against the lost cause. A. R. Holston, a young attorney of Red Lake Falls closed the exercises in a neat and witty little speech full of excellent points that told on the right side. He said that it had been said that a republican at Red Lake Falls was as much of a rarity as a hen's tooth—a hard thing to find but he was happy to announce the fact that there were a few of up there. His speech showed that they are of the right sort if they are all like him. The meeting was thoroughly enjoyed by every republican present and the democrats were permitted to listen to to a few gospel truths for once—truths that will do them good if they will but heed them. Thus, under the most favorable auspices was the campaign opened in Polk County, a campaign that will result in a great and glorious victory to the republican banner.

THE HON. S. G. COMSTOCK,

'Oh, yes! Join the democratic party and have your laws made for you by the southern brigadiers! Be the tail to the southern kite and thus confess the inability of the northern man to make his own laws.

Grand Republican Rally.

Congressman Horr, of Michigan, will address the people of Crookston and vicinity on the political issues of the day on Saturday evening next. The Grand Forks Harrison club intends to bring over their fine cornet band and about 300 members of their club with torches by special train. Mr. Horr is one of the most fluent orators of the day and his speech will be a treat to all who enjoy a good speech. Everybody, democrats as well as republicans, cordially invited.

He Jumped--The Town.

One Prof. LeRoy advertised to jump from the top of Lee & Herrick's mill on Monday evening, at 7:30. Long before that hour a crowd began to assemble, and when the time arrived not less than 5,000 people were on deck. At about 8 the Professor appeared at an upper window of the mill, climbed up a ladder to the roof and directly hoisted a parachute, fooled around with it for awhile, then hauled it back on the roof. In a minute or so he appeared at the edge of the roof and announced that owing to the wind he could not jump to-night, but would jump on Tuesday night. Amid howls of derision the crowd dispersed. On Tuesday it was announced that he would jump from the N. W. elevator at 7:30. When that time arrived it was found that he had jumped—the town.

Lost in London.

Of this play which is to be presented in the opera house on Monday evening, July 30th, the Pioneer Press says:

"The Grand last night was packed to the doors not a seat being obtainable after eight o'clock' and standing room being at a premium, It was the occasion of the first performance of Mr. Newton Beer's spectacular play of "Lost in London." Of this excellent play great praise must be spoken. The arrangement, the details, the plot, the actors, and the magnificent scenory, all demand more than specific mention. The company, as a whole, is good in the extreme. The great feature of the play is the superb scenery used; the snow scene in the fourth act, when the streets of London are portrayed; the conservatory in the fifth act and the last scene in the sixth, are all remarkable effects. The musical divertisements introduced are especially interesting.

Atty Boyle, of Red Lake Falls, is in the city this week,

Have you been into Barnes & Slocum's new store? It is the finest of its kind in the city.

Mrs. Newland, mother of Mrs. S. F. Markham, was brought from her home at Maple Lake, last week, very sick.

Consumer: I have tried trading at the cash store of Barnes & Slocum the past week, and find it pays me immensely.

Will Hall, who arrived several days since, received a severe injury in one knee in a railroad wreck which obliges him to wear a crutch.

Mrs. A.: What a beautiful new set of dishes you have, where did you get them?

Mrs. C.: Why, of Barnes & Slocum of course. They have the finest line of crockery and glassware in the city and there they are giving 25 per cent. discount.

Lots of hay coming to town nowadays, mostly all new hay. It is worth from $5. to $8. per ton according to quality. Should the hay market this year be as good as last, it will prove a bonanza to the farmers in this vicinity.

And now the democrats are kicking because they say the republican platform threatens to give them free whiskey. Well, that is indeed a queer cause of complaint for them to be sure but perhaps they are in earnest, for right well they know that the republican party will come into power in November.

W. H. Jennings writes to M. J. Darling that the loss sustained by A. J. Bigham and L. K. Harmon by the burning of their shingle mill will not exceed $800. The mill was but a temporary affair and no damage was sustained by machinery except the the saws. They will no doubt be running again in a few days.

Fresh fruit and vegetables a specialty with Barnes & Slocum.

Henry T. Gilbertson was in from Sletton this week with witnesses in the Movold case. He reports crops in splendid condition with prospects good for an abundant yield. Should the prices be good this fall the thirteen would take such a boom as it never had before and land within its borders would be desirable property.

Norbert Barrett has returned from the Promised Land, yclept Tacoma, and does not enteuse over the condition of things there not to an alarming extent. He thinks our boys there are not coining wealth by the millions. H saw them all and expects to see most of them back here with us again before long. Mr. Houston he says has not engaged in any business as yet except to work at his trade. Mr. Barrette says a few men of capital are making money but the average man is doing no better there than here in fact lots of 'em not as well. He does not advice people to be in a hurry to go there.

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

Agent Weeks, of the Manitoba, informed a reporter last evening, that arrangements have been completed for the special train to carry all the republicans of Grand Forks city to Crookston to help that city celebrate in proper style on Saturday night of this week. The train will leave the Third Street crossing at 7 p. m. Grand Forks' only and original Cadet band will accompany the excursionists and make things lively with sweet strains of music. Everybody is sure to go and the occasion will be done good justice. A meeting of the republican league of this city has been called to arrange for marching, transparancies etc. After the business of the evening—and the pleasures, also—is concluded the train will return, say along some time in the morning so that the good republicans can get some rest before attending divine service at the houses of worship.

It behooves all good Dakotians who belong to the grand old party to turn out and show the Minnesotians what North Dakota would do, were she a state, in the reinstating of the party, which event will occur without fail in the November election. Republicans of Grand Forks, go to Crookston Saturday night.

THE JOURNAL is in receipt of the first annual catalogue of the Moorhead Normal School which institution commences its life work on Wednesday Aug. 29th 1888. The first or fall session will be 10 weeks, the winter term 16 weeks and the spring term 12 weeks. This school is a noble monument to the efforts of the Hon. S. G. Comstock, to whose efforts more than to any other agency Moorhead owes the possession of this fine institution. The catalogue was printed by the News Printing company at Moorhead and is a creditable job. For the benefit of any of our readers who may desire further information we clip the following from the catalogue:

DIED.

Fisher Bulletin.

THOMPSON.—On July 10th, 1888, Luella May, wife of Hugh Thompson, Esq., aged 23 years.

The above not unexpected event occurred on Tuesday last at 4:45 a. m. The last few days of Mrs. Thompson's life were ones of extreme suffering, causing deep sorrow to her friends. All through her long illness of many months Mrs. Thompson has borne her intense sufferings in a manner eliciting the admiration of her attendants. On Wednesday the funeral took place at 2 p. m. and was the largest we have ever seen in the northwest. The following was the printed order of the day and was carried through without a single error:

Marshall of I. O. O. F.
Coffin.
Chief Mourners.
Odd Fellows Led by Chaplains.
Fisher Cornet Band.
Cortege.

Punctually at the hour named the procession commenced, headed by Bro. Ed. Wile, of Crookston, as marshal of the I. O. O. F. Next in order was the casket (with Capt. DeMers, L. C. McKnight, A. E. Stephens, L. Freeman, Marcus Johnson and T. A. Dunlava as pall bearers) which was a magnificent one in white cloth and silver appointments, with the name engraven on a plate. Then followed the chief mourners and the Fisher Lodge, No. 87, I. O. O. F., with many brothers from Crookston and Red Lake Falls. Next came the Fisher Band playing the beautiful march known as Deans' Funeral Dirge, which was rendered in remarkably fine style. Then the public marched, among whom we noticed P. J. McGuire, O. H. Lucken, Andrew Eiken and Judge Christianson, the county officials from Crookston. The procession wended its way up DeMers avenue to the Presbyterian church, where the casket was placed on a catafalque of beautiful flowers arranged by the kindly hands of the kindest hearts in the world, the ladies of Fisher. Brother, the Rev. S. King, Chaplain of the Lodge, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Mendenhall, of Grand Forks, and Rev. Bro. Jos. Hogg, of Fisher, officiated. After scripture was read the choir sang and Brother Hogg offered prayer. Brother King offered a few kind consolatory remarks about the deceased which were appreciated all the more, since all knew the truth of his laudatory speech. The Rev. Mr. Mendenhall also made a short, touching allusion which brought tears to the eyes of all present. The choir again sang in a manner to call forth the appreciation of all. The chief mourners then passed in front of the casket and took their last sad view of the face they were never again to look upon on earth. After them came the band and public generally. The procession then re-formed and proceeded to the vault of Mr. Thompson where the remains were interred. The church was crowded with people, there not being standing room, and the procession reached from the farthest elevator to the bank. No carriages were there, all testifying their respect for deceased and her husband by marching. It is not our intention to condole with the husband and little Lulu. Others nearer and dearer can and will do that. All we can do is to silently stand by and trust the blow that was struck, by an unseen God, will be tempered by the same Omnipotent Power, and remembering that "they also serve who stand and wait."

MARRIED.

SWANSON—LARSON.—In this city on Wednesday July 18th, by Judge C. O. Christianson, Mr. John F. Swanson to Miss Sarah M. Larson, both of the town of Bray, Polk Co.

The Barnesville Review kicks vigorously because the Norman County Herald intimates that Atty. Taylor, of Moorhead, announces his intention to work and vote for S. G. Comstock for Congress. This reminds us of an item that we saw in the Warren Register, not long since, to the effect that "Atty Taylor, of Moorhead, who is in the village, announces his intention to vote for Mr. Comstock and says he don't care who knows it, and that he may yet decide to take his coat off and work hard for his election. The point to the whole matter is that the aforesaid Atty Taylor is a democrat, and the Review has symptoms of the same disease in an aggravated form and the idea that there is a sensible democrat in the lot is especially distasteful to that sheet. But bless you, Mr. Review, Moorhead is full of that spirit. It permeates every citizen, republican, prohibition, democrat, man woman and child and you will find the votes cast in Moorhead against Mr. Comstock scarcer than hen's teeth, because he is so well known there as an honorable, upright man, one in whom those who know him best have absolute confidence, that even the democrats for once will soar above all party considerations to give their votes to the honest man, the upright citizen. Very evidently there is a surprise party in store for the Review when it receives the vote of Clay County, as Moorhead is not the exception in the matter. If Mr. C. was as well known throughout the district as he is in Moorhead he would go out of the district with the largest vote ever given to any man, not even excepting Knute Nelson when the democrats did not dare name a man against him.

Andrew Timley is fixing up his new stand on Robert St., (John Alderman's old place) in fine shape and will soon have as neat and cosy quarters as can be found in the city. He has received a carload of the celebrated Budweiser beer which which he is prepared to wholesale in quantities to suit. He will soon be ready to receive his friends in style, and invites a call,

DIVISION AND ADMISSION.

The Dakota Two-State Convention Meets at Huron—Details of What Was Done, and the Scenes in Convention.

The division and statehood convention met at Huron, and was called to order by Judge Campbell, who read the call. Waldo M. Potter of Fargo was chosen temporory chairman and W. H. Lyon of Sioux Falls secretary. On taking the chair Mr. Potter gave some reasons for being a divisionist. He said:

We are here to suggest what we think should be done by an incoming legislature, but what that ought to be I am not prepared to say off hand. As representing one of the great parties I take a firm stand on this point. I think we should go on wisely and cautiously and take such measures as will bring us speedily into the Union. I would recommend proceeding in such a way as not to interfere with the plans of friends in the East who are working in our behalf.

The committee to formulate a plan for the statehood convention to recommend to the people, reported the following, after discussing it for eight hours.

First—To urge upon the people of Dakota the vital importance of making division and the admission of the two states of North and South Dakota the controlling issue above and beyond every other issue for all representatives and officers in the fall election.

Second—To urge upon them the especial importance of selecting for the legislature honest, brave and determined men who will pledge themselves first, to a sweeping reform of the abuses which flourish under the present territorial administration, especially in its finance department, and second, to sternly retake from the governor all the despotic and unusual powers which have been bestowed upon him by the legislative authorities of the territory.

Third—To pass laws immediately during the first day of the legislature convoking two constitutional conventions, one for North Dakota, and one for South Dakota, i deemed expedient, and who will pledge themselves, in case the results of the coming presidential election shall be adverse to Dakota, and shall place in power men and parties whose policy and measures shall threaten Dakota with a perpetual or indefinite colonial vassalage, and to take such other measures as they lawfully may for the relief of the people of these two states.

Mr. Keith offered an amendment to change section 3 by requiring the calling of a convention for North Dakota, also one for South Dakota if deemed necessary. A lengthy discussion followed, which resulted in the adoption of Keith's amendment, and then of the report as a whole of the committee; and afterward it was unanimously adopted by the convention.

These committees were appointed: First, a publishing committee, to furnish articles for publication advocating the claims of the two Dakotas for division and admission, composed of Messrs. Aplin of Huron; Potter of Fargo; Brown of De Smet; Adams of Webster; Humphrey of Faulk. Second, a committee of five to prepare an address to the people of North and South Dakota, and which will urge the importance of this movement, and of selecting the most able and suitable men for delegates to congress and men for the territorial legislature. Third, a finance committee of five to raise and expend a campaign fund under direction of campaign committee; members, Messrs. Diggs of Milbank, Snow of Springfield, Ruth of De Smet, Langley of Huron, Pinkerton of Iroquois. Fourth, a campaign committee of five to conduct the campaign and carry out the objects of this convention; members, Messrs. Arnold of Huron, Sheets of Kingsbury, Poindexter of Spink, Johnson of Hyde, Williams of Coddington. Fifth, appointing the chairman of each county to organize his county and a chairman for each legislative district. District chairman—First, E. E. Ericson of Elk Point; Second, George W Hand, of Yankton; Third, Paul Landman of Tyndall; Fourth, W. H. Goddard of Montrose; Fifth, G. A. Silsby of Mitchell; Sixth, B. S. White of Flandeau; Seventh, L. J. Botts of Lake Preston; Eighth, J. W. Shannon of Huron; Ninth, E. W. Foster of Frankfort; Tenth, C. H. Seely of Faulkton; Eleventh, T. E. Price of Hyde; Twelfth, R. E. Carpenter of Watertown; Thirteenth, E. T. Taubman of Brown; Fourteenth, Col. Parker of Deadwood; Fifteenth, T. F. Marshall of Deadwood; Sixteenth, E. A. Fenton of Aurora; Seventeenth, Frank Potter of La Moure; Eighteenth, unappointed; Nineteenth, George B. Winship of Grand Forks; Twentieth, H. E. Hansbrough of Devils Lake; Twenty-first, J. M. Sinclair of Bottineau; Twenty-second, Johnson Nickeus of Jamestown; Twenty-third, E. A. Williams of Bismarck.

These gentlemen were chosen a state central committee: Hugh J. Campbell of Yankton, John A. Owen of De Smet, Joseph Allen of Turner, E. W. Caldwell of Sioux Falls, John Fogarty of Yankton. The utmost harmony has prevailed in all the deliberations of the body and the best of good feeling is noticeable in all.

JOHN BROWN'S COUSIN.

One of the peculiar features of the afternoon session was the appearance of Rev. Edward Brown of De Smet as a delegate. He is a cousin of old John Brown and he voted for Harrison in 1836. In 1840 he had moved and could not vote on account of lacking residence. He made an old-fashioned freedom speech and then sang a Tippecanoe song that he sang in 1840. This created such enthusiasm that the convention called the gentleman back to the platform when all in the great hall arose and with cheers sang one stanza of "John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave;" closing with "America." It was a thrilling scene, never to be forgotten.

WHAT THE LAWYERS SAID.

The enthusiasm in the statehood meeting continued to the close. The class conventions held were as interesting as the proceedings of the general body were on Tuesday and Wednesday. All of these were exceedingly well attended, for delegates continued to arrive down to this noon after the convention adjourned. The lawyers assembled in Grand Army hall. Hon. George Hand of Yankton was elected chairman, and Hon. J. A. Owen of De Smet secretary. Messrs. Owen, Kemp, Poindexter, Evans, Keith and Melville were appointed a committee on resolutions. They reported the following, which was unanimously adopted:

Wheras, We deeply deplore the inadequacy of our territorial courts to transact the businss before them, that our present judiciary system is not suited to the present need of the people, and justice is often denied because so long delayed. Owing to the vast amount of business which our overworked judges are made to transact and whereas, the people are and have too long been denied the right which they have to self-government, and it is time that action was taken to secure this end.

Resolved, That we heartily favor the division of Dakota and the speedy admission of the two states, and concur in and approve the action of the convention held at Huron, July 10 and 11, looking to that result.

THE MINISTERS

convened in the Baptist church, Rev. Edward Brown, of DeSmet, chairman, and Rev. D. S. McCastin of Huron, clerk. They put forth this declaration:

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the action of the two states convention now in session in this city. That we welcome the prospect of two states for the citizens of Dakota, believing that thereby not only shall we secure our political rights, but shall be set free from the demoralizing influence that has corrupted our people by the display of unwarranted federal interference. That we recommend to our brethern of the clergy a vigorous support of this movement until it shall result in complete success.

Then came the

in the grand opera house. They re-elected D. W. Diggs of Milbank chairman and Joseph Allen of Turner clerk. Messrs. DeVoe, Shurtliff and Gross, as a committee, reported and the convention adopted the following:

We heartily concur in the action of the statehood convention now assembled in Huron. We as farmers and business men are keenly alive to the injustice done us by the additional burdens of taxation that we bear as a result of our territorial vassalage, which condition withholds from us an aggregate of a million dollars per annum which might be made available by our admission into the Union by the sale of our school lands. Our territorial condition works an especial hardship in preventing capital from seeking investment here and this is the direct cause of our depressed financial condition, which condition compels the borrower to pay an extortionate rate of interest; that is in the interest of every man to unite the efforts now being made for the admission of two states into the Union.

THE REPORTS ADOPTED.

When these three conventions finished their labors they reported their proceedings to the general convention. All the reports were cheered and ordered to go on file with the records.

The convention unanimously adopted the following

ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE:

To the people of the two Dakotas: Such a day as the one now shining never dawned upon us before. We have secured recognition from one of the great national parties, the same as we shall have when both our states are within the Union; so that the work for two states is now more popular than one. It now remains for us to make one supreme effort and our work is done. In this champaign, for the first time the two Dakotas are keeping step to the same music. The same goal is before them both. The people of both sections now see alike the necessity of using the same means to secure a common end. All this portends victory for us, and in the very near future. But while this is possible, it will not come of itself. We dare not relax a single nerve. We cannot cease our vigilance. Having begun we must stay through to the end. We may have personal choices in party, in hopes for progress, in various affiliations, but for the present emergencies we must subordinate them all and make foremost our unalterable purpose at all hazards and at whatever cost. Dakota shall be redeemed. To do this we must help ourselves. "Fear God and take your own part," must still be our motto. To do this let us elect for our next legislature only such men as will, first of all, stand together for the two Dakotas. Men who will be neither frightened or cajoled into wavering from their position. Men who will not be afraid to strip from the office of our alien governor the power and the perquisites that we should never think of giving even to a governor of our own choice. Men who will make no appropriation of our money that is not clearly warranted by the organic act. Men who will at the first opportunity, move forward to accomplish statehood for both Dakotas. In this way we shall reduce the evils of our territorial condition to the lowest point, and make more sure the coming of complete triumph of home rule. Only once does North Dakota need to join hands to end this provincial degradation and begin the glory of our statehood life.

Sixty Canadian laborers, who have been employed by the Grand Trunk at Port Huron and other points on the St. Clair river, have been compelled by Custom Collector Ward to cross to Canada to return no more. This is done under the alien labor law, providing that no foreign laborers can be brought to this country under contract for service.

The waters that have been sweeping the valley of the Monongahela and the valleys of its tributaries are again falling into their natural channels. They leave desolation and ruin. From Pittsburg to the mountains of West Virginia towns have been ravaged, manufactories inundated, boats sunk, houses and lumber floated off, fields devastated, families driven to the hills for shelter. The losses entailed by the flood will not fall short of $3,000,000.

Two brothers named Andrew and Fred Netzer started east from Hodges, Mont., on the Northern Pacific road in a box car. Four tramps occupied the car, and they presented revolvers and demanded money. Andrew jumped from the train and left his brother. The last he heard of Fred he was calling murder in Dutch. Andrew continued to steal rides till he reached Mandan, expecting to find Fred already there, but no news was received of him. He thinks the tramps murdered him and disposed of his body.

Kerrick & Watson's camp of bridge builders, containing twenty-six men, who are employed in constructing the long bridge of the Eastern railway across the Femadji river, Wisconsin, was the scene of what has been reported to be a wholesale poisoning case. Near as could be learned fourteen of the twenty-six men were taken sick after supper, and the cause is directly traceable to some hash which was served at the meal, from the fact that, only those who partook of the hash were taken ill. The nature of the poison cannot be determined as yet, but the doctor at this early stage advanced the theory of vegetable poisoning. He predicts that all will survive. The cook, Edward Coleman has fled.

In the French chamber of Deputies, Gen. Boulanger proposed the dissolution of the chamber. His proposition was rejected. Gen. Boulanger thereupon resigned his seat. Gen. Boulanger, in his speech proposing the dissolution became so irascible and personal that he was censured by the chamber, and he was shortly after challenged by M. Floquet to fight a duel.

Some weeks ago the citizens of Granite Falls, Minn., offered to donate $5,000, providing the county commissioners would build a court house at that place of brick or stone costing not less than $12,000. The commissioners accepted the proposition, agreeing to erect a building in Granite Falls at a cost not to exceed $15,000. It is proposed to put in the foundation this fall and erect the building next season.

John Zachar, of Racine, Wis., who has existed fifty-three days without food, broke his fast at last. Until now the true reason of his abstinence from food was not known. Last March or April he had a difference with his father about wages, and a quarrel ensued. Zachar determined to kill himself by starvation. A reconciliation finally took place, and he concluded to live. He presents a wasted and revolting appearance.

The Prussian authorities have summoned Queen Natalie to deliver the crown prince to King Milan's plenipotentiaries. The queen has refused, and has threatened to forcibly resist the removal of the prince. She has armed the members of her household for the purpose of offering resistance.

A fire starting from a hot box after the mill had been temporarily shut down at noon totally destroyed the big saw mill at Withee Station east of Eau Claire, Wis., owned by Dr. J. Spaulding of Black River Falls. The lumber yard narrowly escaped. Loss, $50,000; insured for $30,000.

Letters to the government and Hudson's Bay company from their agents at Hazelton, Skeena river, N. W. T. show that a most alarming state of affairs exists there. Mr. Hall, of the Hudson Bay company, at Port Simpson, says: I beg to call your attention to the lawless state of the Indians on the upper Skeena and the apparent inability of the government to keep peace and protect life and property there. The present state of affairs is a disgrace to the country. Life and property are openly threatened and the development of trade thereby seriously retarded.

It is learned that Landlord Scully is about to sell his Illinois holdings. He owns 29,000 acres in Sangamon and other counties. For several years he has carried on the Irish rack-renting system. Scully also owns enormous tracts of land in Nebraska and Kansas where the same rack-renting system is pursued.

A ROMANCE OF TO-DAY.

This was a ridiculous time of year to be staying in what was in reality a summer hotel. There was no help for it, however. A calamity had befallen Mr. Banjamin Baxter's, town house. It was one of a row of handsome marble-front residences, and a fire that had occurred next door had resulted in his own domicile being so thoroughly flooded with water as to require almost endles repairs and renovations to furniture, carpet, walls, ceilings and the like. The firemen, too, had with commendable zeal, smashed in a large section of the roof, necessitating considerable repairs in that direction.

Mr. Baxter, who was a retired plumber, believed in repairing this sort of thing thoroughly, and also in personally superintending the work. Moreover he informed his excellent wife and dutiful daughter that such was his hatred of city hotels that he would rig up a tent and camp out in the vacant lot opposite should they attempt to move into town before their dwelling was in readiness to receive them. As for himself, there was no difficulty; he was comfortaubly provided for in the rooms of an elderly bachelor friend in the same block, right on the ground, where he could hurry the repairs forward with all possible speed.

Mrs. Baxter, being a thoroughly amiable lady, and devoted to her husband, acquiesced in these arrangements, though there was a good reason why they should be particularly trying to her at this time. The cause for her trouble lay in the continued presence of the two young men who had persistently laid siege to the affections of her daughter Ethel all through the summer. And, in order to obtain an idea of the exact situation at this time, a few words of explanation are necessary.

The two young men were named respectively Mr. Edgar Ingram and Mr. Clarence Forbes. They were residents of the same city as the Baxter family, and as a matter of course, while outwardly civil to each other, were in reality on terms of the deadliest rivalry. Mr. Forbes had the advantage of old acquaintance, having known the family for nearly two years. Mr. Ingram, on the other hand, was a comparative novelty. He had known the family only a few months, but had certainly made good use of his time. He possessed the advantages of a certain sort of good looks, cultivated manners and considerable money. Mr. Forbes, on the contrary, had little in the world save a handsome figure and a still handsomer face. He was a struggling young attorney and still had his way to make. The two, as has been intimated, had not as yet come to an open quarrel, though they had several times come perilously near it. Of the attitude of the parents it may be said Mr. Baxter's was one of total indifference; he simply adored his fair-haired girl and said in effect that there was nothing on earth she could not do that she had a mind to. Mrs. Baxter, however, was, not unnaturally, strongly in favor of Mr. Ingram, whose superior advantages in the way of wealth and position there was no denying. Miss Ethel herself was noncommittal, so far; but, being an extremely dutiful daughter, was far from being unaffected by her mother's counsel. Then, too, Clarence had chosen to be as jealous and hateful as a bear of late, and the desire to demonstrate to him that she was entirely mistress of her own inclinations was much too strong to be resisted.

This morning, a dull, gray, unpleasant morning early in November, Mr. Forbes and Miss Baxter had come nearer to an open quarrel than for many'a long month. He had accused her point-blank of trifling with him; she had retorted that she did not wish to trifle with him an instant longer than he himself choose to be trifled with, so there. Her big blue eyes had snapped wickedly as she said it, too; and poor Clarence had wandered away alone down the beach, a very disconsolate man indeed.

It was nearly two hours when he returned, much to late for dinner. Just as he was turning aside to ascend the slope to the hotel he caught sight of a small group of figures on the beach, and observed a lank fisher-youth, with bare feet and a tattered blue flannel shirt, in the act of lauching a heavy yawl, used at this late season for fishing excursions. Mr. Forbes hesitated a moment, glanced at the sky, and then walked quickly down and joined the little party, Miss Ethel glanced at him indifferently; Mr. Ingram accorded him with a supercilious nod. Mrs. Baxter barely noticed him.

"I beg your pardon," began Clarence, bowing gracefully, "but I venture to hope that you do not contemplate a sail this morning."

"Oh yes, Mr. Forbes, we did," replied Mrs. Baxter, cheerfully, with an unmistakable emphasis on the pronoun.

Clarence ignored the snub and began again: "I beg you will not think me intrusive, Mrs. Baxter," he said, "but I can lay claim to enough weather-wisdom to feel certain that a sail in a tub like this to-day may prove extremely unpleasant, and I hope you will not undertake it."

Mr. Ingram's sneer became more accentuated.

But Clarence looked so handsome and so earnest that Mrs. Baxter, who was not a valiant soul on the water, might have relented. But Ethel, who got it into her sunny little head that Clarence merely wished to spoil her sail in Ingram's company, decreed otherwise. With Ingram still sneering industriously, she stepped into the boat, drew her mother in after her and signed to the fisher-boy and Ingram to push off. Don't be concerned about us, Mr. Forbes," she called out, sweetly, "but you may come with us, if you like, and if you are not afraid."

She had no idea that he would accept the invitation, but it was all he was waiting for. The boat was ten feet from shore, but he ignored the ruination wrought to his handsome drab trousers and glittering patent leathers and rushed through the strip of water, clutching the gunwale just in time to be drawn into the now rapidly-moving craft. Both ladies gave vent to a cry of surprise at this extraordinary proceeding, and Mr. Ingram so far forgot his task of sneering as to laugh a little. Clarence said nothing, but glowered at him very savagely and clambered down into the bow, where he crouched down, very cold, very uncomfortable and altogether miserable

He had not been there five minutes before he began to feel thoroughly thankful that he was there. The yawl was under mainsail, top sail and jib, and by and by her old timbers fairly creacked with the way she was flying through the water. The wind was almost dead off shore and increasing every moment. Mr. Ingram stood at the tiller and directed the boy in the manipulation of the sails. Ethel fairly shouted with glee at the magnificence of the run, and Mr. Ingram almost felt compensated for his rival's presence.

It was not long, however, before Mrs. Baxter noticed the extreme haziness of the shore line and began to realize the distance they were out. In spite of Ethel's protest she peremptorily bade Mr. Ingram put the boat about and make for the shore.

It was not until the young man attempted to put her orders into execution that those on board realized tde force of the wind that was blowing. It came with great, powerful gusts and made a horribel singing sound as it swept through the scanty rigging. Then, too, it suddenly beame apparent that while Mr. Ingram was sufficiently expert at running a boat before a fair wind and an outward sea, he was a very landlubber when it came to a question of tacking for the return journey. The instant that he realized this, Mr. Forbes sprang to his feet and staggered to the stern, where sat Mrs. Baxter and Ethel, both looking very pale and very frightened.

"Better give me the tiller, Ingram," he said to his rival, without arrogance, but with a quiet authority that should have told any one but a simpleton that he meant to have his way.

"I shall do no such thing," retorted Mr. Ingram, growing very white; "I know how to sail a boat!"

At the instant he made the remark a false movement of the tiller threw the groaning little vessel with her side squarely to an incoming wave. There was a rush of water and every one on board was drenched through and through. There was a cry of terror from the boy, who was seen to be hanging for dear life to the rope of the mainsail, which, secured by a single turn, was being slowly torn from his hand. With one bound Clarence was at his side, the rope was hauled home and the little vessel went tearing diagonally over the great waves, in the direction of the shore, but in a manner that if adhered to would land them ten miles below their starting point.

Turning like lightning Clarence came splashing headlong through the water and spray to where Ingram crouched at the tiller, almost paralyzed by the narrowness of the escape. "If you don't get out of there," thundered Clarence, his voice rising high above the wind, "d—n me if I don't throw you overboard."

The ladies screamed; but in the midst of her terror Miss Ethel could not stifle a feeling of admiration for a man who swore in the very face of death. Still she knew it was very wicked, and she put her cheek close to her mother's and closed her eyes and prayed.

As for Mr. Ingram, he quitted the tiller sullenly, and sat down opposite the ladies with his feet dangling in eight inches of water. Looking at him presently, Clarence became convinced that the man was terrified beyond all human understanding, and there arose in him a great bitterness of spirit to think that his brave, flaxen-haired darling over there had placed her affections on such an object. To so fearful a pass did Mr. Ingram's terrors bring him that he presently lay down full length upon the thwart, his face covered with his hands and his occasional groan and appeals to Heaven for mercy, the only sounds he could utter.

For four long hours did Clarence, assisted by the gallant fisher-youth, who worked with all his young might, do battle with the angry waters. His hat had blown off, and in the gathering darkness Ethel could see how wan and tired and hopeless his face looked. The curly hair, about which she had so often joked him, lay in damp masses on his forehead, and she fairly ached to risk upsetting the dancing by leaping up and smoothing down the matted locks with her white, soft hand. Clarence uttered no word, save to assure the ladies that they should reach the shore safely if it took all winter to do it. Mrs. Baxter's face was a study. She kept her arms tightly about her beloved daughter and her glance wandered from time to time from the stern, miserable face of the man at the helm to the now silent, motionless form on the seat opposite. Mr. Ingram had either fainted or fallen asleep. Had he been able to note the expression of the older lady's face as she glanced at him he would hardly have felt flattered.

The shore was still a mile and a half away, and darkness had fairly settled down upon the sea, when a rather strange thing happened. On his last tack Clarence had noticed the wind to be veering, and now, to his infinite joy, he felt it coming squarely abeam. Further and further it swung, until almost dead astern; and once again the little craft began her career over the waves under a full pressure of sail.

Ladies," remarked Clarence, icily, "we are saved."

His tone did not encourage an extended response, and none was attempted; but the eyes of both ladies contained moisture for which the spray was hardly responsible. The novelty of again rushing headlong through the water aroused Mr Ingram. He sat up suddenly, rubbed his eyes and surveyed the situation. He looked ahead, and as they rose on the crest of a wave, perceived lights twinkling along the shore.

"They're out looking for us," he said, with a faint attempt at jauntiness "Forbes, perhaps you'd better let me take the tiller now; you must be used up."

Mr. Forbes looked at him savagely and rejoined, with great emphasis: "Lie down again and shut up!"

Mr. Ingram disregarded the first mandate, but obeyed the second.

On and on swept the little craft, riding gallantly with her heavy load of water and human beings over the crests of the great seas. Nearer and nearer they drew to the shore, where the swarm of twinkling lanterns on the beach spoke of the anxiety that prevailed there. In five minutes more the boat was dashed upon the beach and a dozen men sprang to clutch the gunwale and drag her out of reach of the receding wave. The first man to greet the voyagers was Mr. Benjamin Baxter, who had run down on a late train and down whose big, kindly face, tears of joy were chasing themselves. After he had kissed his wife something more than a hundred times he turned to look at the others. But there was only one other, Miss Ethel stood there, drenched and wretched, both men had slipped through the crowd and disappeared.

In less than half an hour, having seen his wife and dougater safely to bed, Mr. Baxter started out into the corridors to look for Clarence. He had not to go far, for on passing his room he noticed a light there. He went in without knocking, walked up to where Clarence stood, with his elbows on the mantel and his face leaning upon his hands, put his arm about the young man's shoulders and looked into his eyes. I can't speak, boy," he said, in a choking sort of voice, "all that I can say to you—and I say it from the bottom of my heart—is that you're a noble fellow. God bless you!"

Then he noticed that the room was in a terrible muddle. Clothes, hats, sticks, pipes and every thing else that goes to make up a young man's summer wardrobe, were scattered about the floor in confusion; while an open portmanteau lay near by. "What does this mean, Clarence?" the old gentleman asked.

"It means," replied the young man bitterly, that I'm going away from here before I'm an hour older. Yes, I'll tell you why," he added fiercely, in answer to the mute inquiry of Mr. Baxter's eyes, "it's because I love your daughter Ethel so well that life without her will be a misery to me, while she"—choking down a sob—"she cares more for a look from that d—d poltroon than she does for my whole soul and body; that's why!"

Mr. Baxter gazed very earnestly at the young giant, who looked wonderfully handsome and brave and honest standing there in his wet clothes. Then the old gentleman's eyes began to twinkle a little. He was always something of a humorist.

"Clarence," he remarked, oracularly, "you're a brave boy; but you're a fool. "Don't stop me sir," he went on, "but I've just come from Ethel, all I've got to say is that if you leave here this night you'll wish you had been drownded, as you deserved to be."

When Mr. Baxter was excited, Lindley Murray frequently suffered. Clarence, however, did not notice it this time. Having delivered himself of his parting shot Mr. Baxter wrung the young man's hand and left him.

And Clarence stayed. But the queerest part of the whole affair was that from the instant the boat had touched the shore, Mr. Ingram vanished from their sight and ken as utterly as if the sea had "drowned" him—as Mr. Benjamin Baxter would have put it.

In Ancient Egypt.

Type-writers are a modern luxury, but sixteen or seventeen centuries ago young women were employed in the Alexandrian library copying books for sale.

When an ancient Egyptian found himself in need of money he could always negotiate loans upon the mummies of his ancestors. Mummies were considered gilt-edged securities.

The Alexandrians were passionately fond of cock-fighting. Eros, a tax-gatherer, having committed the unpardonable crime of roasting and eating the champion cock, was crucified by order of the Emperor Augustus.

The Egyptians were among the first people to discourage vagrancy. They had a law making it the duty of magistrates to cause every man to give an account of how he earned his livelihood. Solon, after visiting Egypt, gave a similar law to the Athenians.

Cleopatra, in addition to her other charms, was somewhat of a practical joker. One day she accompanied Antony on a fishing expedition. Antony's luck was poor, so he surreptitiously ordered one of his men to dive into the water and put upon his hook a fish that he had previously caught, Cleopatra saw the trick, but said nothing. The next day she brought a large party of friends to see the fishing, and when Antony let down his line she sent one of her own divers to attach the fish. When the line was drawn up Antony was much embarrassed and his friends greatly amused to find on the hook a salted herring.

HE DRANK HASHISH.

Remarkable Experience of a Drug Clerk who Blundered in Taking Medicine.

Manchester Union.

But a few miles from this city lives a man who was once as fine a drug clerk as there was in the city of Boston. But that was some time ago, and no doubt he is forgotten by the fraternity in that city. His name is Rolphie R. Sanford, and he is at present residing with his widowed mother, who owns a fine residence not far from Manchester. Sanford is some over 40 years of age, and is a complete wreck. His hair is as white as snow, and his left side has been paralyzed from the crown of his head to his feet. Besides this, while mixing chemicals at the last place in Boston where he worked, an unforseen combination ensued, and an explosion was the result. This explosion proved most disastrous to Sanford. He got the bulk of the flying liquid in his face, and his nose was fairly eaten off. He was ill for a long time, and during his sickness his whole left side was paralyzed, as stated above For a number of years he has resided with his mother. Within the last three years he has partly recovered the use of his afflicted side and in the summer time manages to get around and do a little garden work, the Sanford place being noted for the quality of the vegetables raised and the beauty of the floral plants. Sanford is a most interesting conversationalist, and is full of stories regarding the life of a drug clerk, in whose existence there are many times crowded incidents alike ludicrous, serious and full of the terrible. His experience with hashish is worth reproducing. Hashish is the foundation of the same wonderful extract that figures in Monte Cristo. The name by which it goes among druggists is "extractum cannabis indicæ," or extract of Indian hemp. The liquid preparation resembles ink in appearance—a dark green ink. Its fragrance is of a narcoti odor, and in taste it is slightly warm, bitterish and acid. In Hindostan, Persia and other parts of the East, hemp has habitually been employed as an intoxicating agent. The parts used are the tops of the plant and a resinous product obtained from it. The plant is cut after flowering and formed into bundles from two to four feet long by three inches in diameter, which are sold in the bazaars by the name of gunjah. The resin obtained is formed into balls by the natives, and is smoked like tobacco, with which it is said to be frequently mixed. An infusion or decoction of the drink is sometimes used as an exhilarating drink.

A representative of the Union saw Sanford some time ago, and as it was just after dinner, and he had partaken of his meal with unusual relish, he was just in the mood for talking. "Why, my boy," said he, "drug clerks of course have secrets. You want me to tell you a little story, eh? If I should tell you some of the secrets, of course they would be secrets no longer, but I'll tell you a little of my experience with hashish. It's a stuff that no one wants to meddle with with impunity, allow me to assure you. If I had not been careless I would not now be able to tell you my experience with hashish. It was some 8 or 10 years ago when I was at work with a prominent druggist in Boston. For some little time I had been suffering with dyspepsia, and the ailment bothered me so that life became unbearable. I at last mixed up a decoction that gave me great relief. I was to take it before meals and placed the bottle on a shelf behind the prescription counter among other bottles which are usually found in that place. One noon I went to take my medicine. I took down what I thought to be the right bottle, and discarding the use of a spoon, I placed the orifice to my mouth and took a large swollow. Horrors! The taste told me that I had made a mistake! I looked at the bottle and—well my friend, I had taken a large dose of Indian cannabis, or otherwise hashish. I knew what the results would be, I staggered back to the rear part of the store. How queer I felt. How light I was growing. Up, up, up I went until my head bobbed against the ceiling. I was like a cork floating on disturbed water. I glided along and could look down and see the huge bottles, each one with a hideous face laughing at me. The stool on the marble floors seemed to want to keep me company and their click, click, on the marble floor sounded like thunder in my ears. Suddenly I was plunged into inky blackness. From the black nothingness flashed out bright balls of light. I reached the sofa and sank down upon it. My tongue seemed to swell and I tried in vain to scream, but no sound issued. I seemed to know that there was a long, long hour before my fellow-clerk would be back from his dinner, and then he might not come into the rear room and discover my condition. The events of days and weeks came before my mind in all the details and I saw faces—beautiful faces—angelic in their divinity, which seemed to beckon to me and then vanish with a hideous laugh. All normal conditions and relations seemed to be presented. Again was I tossed to the ceiling and then thrown by some invisible force from one side of the room to the other. I felt no concussion, but bounced about like a huge foot ball. Then I fell back into dreamy contemplation and cars seemed to pass by. Fantastic pictures were worked, my limbs felt weighted with lead, just the opposite to my experience of what seemed to me years ago. I heard somebody say, why Rolphie, old fellow, what's the matter! Rolphie! Rolphie! The words reverberated like thunder. My shopmate had returned. Again he tried to shake me to myself, and I never hated a man so cordially as I hated him at that moment. He got a doctor, and I tell you, my friend, they had no easy time to bring me to myself. Every word they uttered surged into my brain and seemed to jar me to pieces. That was a peculiarity of the stuff. I suffered from that experience long afterwards, and it appears even at this day, when I think it over that I have that feeling coming on, so powerful was the impression made on me at that time."

The Sense of Pre-Existing.

American Notes and Queries.

Perhaps, after all, if history is ever to be verified, that verification may be found in our own minds. It has always been a favorite speculation of poets and metaphysicians that man is a microcosm, containing within himself the history of the race and of the universe—if only we had wit to read it. De Quincey compared the human brain to a palimpsest. Now, a palimpsest (the word means "twice rubbed") is a roll of parchment cleansed of its manuscript in order to make room for new manuscript. The rude chemistry of the ancients could efface the old sufficiently to leave a field for the new, yet not sufficiently to make the traces of the elder manuscript irrecoverable for us. Palimpsests have been found that yielded many successive layers of manuscript. The traces of each handwriting, regularly effaced, have the inverse order regularly called back by the magic of modern chemistry, and as the chorus of the Athenian stage unwove through the anti-strophe every step that had been mystically woven through the strophe, so, by our modern conjurations of science, secrets of ages remote from each other have been exercised from the accumulated shadows of centuries. "What else than a natural and mighty palimpsest," continues De Quincey, "is the human brain? Such a palimpsest is my brain; such a palimpsest, oh reader, is yours. Everlasting layers of ideas, images, feelings, have fallen upon your brain softly as light. Each succession has seemed to bury all that went before. And yet, in reality, not one has been extinguished." The comparison is apt and fine. Every one has experienced the strange tricks that memory occasionally plays. You are engaged in reading, in writing, in serious occupation which engrosses your mental powers. Suddenly there bursts into your thoughts some recollection of childhood, some trivial circumstance that happened years ago and was forgotten immediately afterward. Not the minutest analogy need exist between your present thoughts and the unbidden recollection that starts, goblin-like, from the sealed-up vaults of the past. Does this not indicate that experience in life, no matter how frivolous, leaves an indelible print on the mental organism, and that, though this print may seem to fade, it is still there, like writing in invisible ink, or the effaced manuscript on the palimpsest—only waiting for some exciting cause to bring it out clearly and legibly? The truth is enforced by the experience of death. Those who have recovered from drowning or hanging say that previous to the advent of unconsciousness they have seen a sort of panorama of their whole previous existence, with not the smallest incident, thought, or feeling omitted; and it is thence inferred that all human beings at the moment of dissolution experience this awful resurrection of the dead past. Again it is well known that very aged people are used to throw back and concentrate the light of their memory upon scenes of early childhood, recalling many which had faded, even to themselves, in middle life, while they often forgot although the whole intermediate stages of their existence. "This shows," says De Quincey, "that naturally and without violent agencies the human brain is by tendency a palimpsest." But our brains are inherited from our ancestors. Why, then, may it not be that the human brain is a palimpsest, containing more or less faded, yet recoverable, records, not only of our entire past life, but of the lives of our ancestors to the remotest periods?

A Child Held for Its Board Bill.

A singular condition of affairs regarding the custody of a child was brought to light in the supreme judicial court recently in the hearing by Judge Allen on a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was Daniel Lucy, a resident of Lynn, who sought to regain possession of his daughter, Nellie Lucy, aged 3½ years. The little girl has been in the custody of Michael Welch, who resided at 76 Harvard street, since the death of her mother some time during the latter part of last December. Welch was in court, together with the child, to show cause why the writ should not be granted. He had no counsel, and amazed the court by the statement that, although no relative of the child, he proposes to keep it in charge until her father liquidated an alleged debt to him of $60, due for the maintenance of the little girl since the death of her mother. Judge Allen lost no time in granting the writ. This is probably the first time slavery was abolished in Massachusetts that a human being has been held as collateral security in this commonwealth.

"Progress and Poverty."

Contemporary Review.

The hazy idea that one man's wealth involves another man's poverty still induces a good deal of preaching against "culpable luxury," without any clear idea of what the culpabibeness consists in. This unguarded condemnation of luxurious expenditure is a heritage of simpler times and of simpler morals. When the world was poor, wealth had the form of a store of goods. From this store a man was always subtracting something for his subsistence; to it he was bound to add, on the whole, more than he withdrew. There was little command over nature; man had to do the hard work, with only his strong arms for tools; and, as no one had a right to waste much, Luxury was culpable. But our wealth, and our manner of getting wealth, are entirely changed. The hand of a man is now known to be a very weak tool, although a very cunning one; so we hand over the artistic work of the world to be done by it, but the work we get done for us by the forces of nature we have pressed into our service.

A 10-Year-Old Named Peru.

"Yes, sir," said old Jack West, reflectively, "I've been shipmates with many a nat'al born brave man, but the bravest un I ever shipped yet with was a 10-year-old name' Peru."

"Name' what?"

The old tar deliberately knocked the ashes from his clay pipe and, having performed that manœuvre with the calmness and dignity becoming a boatswain's mate, he glanced coolly at his interrogator.

"Name' Peru."

"How came 'im name' Peru?"

Old Jack laid his pipe in his lap, and drawing his jackknife and navy plug, slowly begun shaving of strips of tobacco, until his critical glance measured a pipeful. Then crumbling the todacco in his left hand until it was almost powdered, he tucked the knife back in his belt and emptied the tobacco into his pipe.

"Who took my matches?" asked the old man, as he fumbled in his pocket.

A light was handed him, and presently as the smoke curled upward, Jack settled his broad back comfortably against a convenient chest and looked thoughtfully upward.

That was his invariable way of announcing ready, and they all knew it.

"Let's have the yarn, Jack."

"Well, boys, it's like this: It was back in '39, w'en I was younger 'an I am now, an' down yere on the South Pacific with the flagship, Marion. I was the spryest man in the gig's crew in them days, an' pulled for ole Admiral Lane; long time ago it was, too. Well, one evenin' in April the Admiral wanted to go ashore, and they sung out for the gig's crew, an' in a shake or so we were alongside the quay in Callao. The boat's crew was left in the gig, and I'll boun' they was all snoozin' w'en the ole Admiral stepped in an' piped sorter quick like:

"Cast off there, boys and pull for the ship."

"An' there he was with the tiller-ropes in his hand, with a basket er bottles handy, and crouched down between his feet like a scared houn' was one of the cutest chips of a lubber you ever lay your eyes on."

'I heard the Admiral say presently:"

"'What's your name, nigger?" and the little shaver piped back, sorter tremblin':"

"'Peru, senor.

"Them wasn't' " the days w'en a lubber could boast about like he owned the ship, nor yit the time w'en coward folks was in demand, but somehow or other they all liked the little shaver. He would tremble if the wind blowed, but he was so humble like an' handy that they all had a kin' word for the little Peru. Jes' tell 'im an' he would go, an' a better shoeblack for Sunday inspection I ain't seed yit. The Admiral had a little gal 'long with 'im, er orphan, an' she was a mighty pretty one. Maybe the Admiral didn't love that little gal o' his'n. Bless my soul, there warn't anything good enough for her, and if anybody besides the Admiral knowed it, that feller was little Peru. W'en skies was good that little gal would come on deck, an' little Peru was happy as a king, an' the ole Admiral would ust smoke his big pipe an' pace the quarter eck an' look as if he didn't care whether it ained or snowed. You never seed a prettier picture in the chaplains's book than them little shavers made way back in '39. Peru he would look as trim an' happy as you please, an' that little gal with long hair an' a laugh—why these yer mermaids ain't no circumstance."

"Well, one might the storm came on sudden like, an' you can shiver my Yankee timbers if it warn't a storm. Royal and to'gallants was down and topsails to the las' reef, but the old ship pitched an' rolled an' heaved like you never seed. I lowed as how me an' Davy Jones would be shipmates if that thing didn't stop fore long, with the mast a swayin' an' creakin.' The water rolled over her bows an' swept the decks as clean as a whistle—chicken-coops, kegs an' all. There was the old Admiral with his arms wrapped in the riggin' gear an' sheltered like by the mast, and Peru, with his big eyes a shinin' an' stickin' like a leach alongside the Admiral. It was wuss and wuss, an' along 'bout w'en it was gettin' dark already, I heerd the little gal say:

"Papa! Where is papa?"

"She must er got scared down in the cabin, an' there she war at the cabin ladder. Jes' as she started fur the Admiral the ship gave one big long lurch, an' the green seas rolled aft like a flash of lightnin'."

"I heerd one little scream, an' seem like I can sorter remember a white face as the water rolled past, an,' then it was over. The little gal was gone. An' the Admiral? It beats me to see a woman cry, but I never want to see such agony again. He was crazy, an' if me an' Tom Bowen an' old Ben Towns hadn'er grabbed 'im the Marion wouldn't er had no Admiral sure. It was so quick.

"Little Peru? There was an old cracked life preserver strapped there to the mizzen mast w'at I'd use for a pillow ever since we left 'Frisco. And before you could wink the life preserver was gone and Peru was gone. Right overboard an' the waves like the hills. I jes shuddered all over.

"The ship was put aback and the lifeboat lowered an' manned. They knew that little Essie was gone, an' Peru was gone, an' not a man flinched as she dropped into the foam.

"I watched the brave fellows as they pushed off, an' I felt mighty solemn, boys, for they don't git back often in a storm like that. In a little while they was lost in the dark, an' you couldn't hear them hail any longer.

"It was awful. We must have been half a knot from where the little gal went over, an' driftin' in spite of all we could do. Them minutes was mighty long ones, an' I jest knowed if that crew ever got back they wouldn't bring neither Essie nor Peru, an' it would kill the Admiral. There he was with his glasses a peeking into the dark, an' the lads a watchin' an' a hopin.'

"Sudden like he threw down the glass and yelled:

"'Boat ahoy!'

"I thought the brave Admiral had just gon crazy from grief an' anxiousness, but I listened an' it seemed like I heerd the hail returned. It was faint an' mist like, jes as they say the Flying Dutchman hails you at night.

"The old Admiral clasped his hands an' said:

"'Thank God! Thank God?'

"Then he put his hands to his mouth, an' yelled again:

"Boat, ahoy!"

"An' the answer came back faint:

"Aye—aye—sir?"

"And the Admiral cried an' laughed, an' laughed an' cried till the tears came into my eyes.

"I knowed, you see, that they never could pick up a baby even if she could a lived through it all, an' I pitied the Admiral, fur the disappointment would kill 'im. He never seemed to imagine that the little gal might not be there.

"The water was calmin' down, an' the wind, too, an' the hails kept gettin' clearer an' clearer, till presently you could make out a boat pullin' for the ship. An' w'en we was erbout a deck's length off, the coxwain dropped his oar an' got up in the boat an' said:

"'Admiral, we've got the little gal, sir!'

"And every soul on that ship cheered. It came natural an' altogether. They didn't need no feller to start 'em over together by wavin' his cap—it jist come at once like, an' such glad hearty cheers as I never heard the like of. They throwed 'em a rope, an' they eased up alongside an hooked on. The old Admiral was there a cryin' an' a laughin', and', as the boat was hoisted they handed him the gal. The Admiral just got on his knees an' folded her clost an' kissed her again an' again. Let me tell you right now, lads, there wasn't a dry eye in that ship's crew.

"Boys, the little gal was wearin' that old life preserver. I was holdin' the lantern, an' maybe my hand was a tremblin' or maybe my eye was dim, for it seemed to be sorter wavy like to me.

"She was leanin' her head on his shoulder, an' he was holdin' her hand in his. I don't think the Admiral could have noticed the life preserver till she tried to unlace it. The Admiral unlaced it for her, an' it seemed like he was puzzlin' hard as he did so.

"As he dropped it on the deck she said:

"The old Admiral didn't say nothin.'

"'When is Peru comin' back, papa?'

"The Admiral bowed his head like he was prayin,' and the little one said:

"Don't cry, papa. Peru will come, for he promised to meet me again.'"

A special from Maniton Springs, Col., says: Mrs. Henry Moore, wife of the managing Editor of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, received a telegram informing her of her husband's elopement with Mrs. John Norton. She was completely prostrated by the news, and refuses to be seen by any one. Mrs. Moore arrived at the springs recently. It is understood she will start on her return to St. Louis.

James Russell Lowell resists all efforts of the physicians to cure him of the gout. He evidently likes the disease—it's so English, you know!

The largest railroad system in the world is the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fe, which operates about 8,000 miles of road.

An Indiana lawyer who has been looking up the matter a little finds that there are 800 dead laws on the statute books of that state.

A crazy farmer named Ladd was kicked on the head by a horse the other day and knocked senseless. When he came to he was as sane as anybody, but could remember nothing of the last fifteen years.

A French writer classes all women by the size of their thumbs. Those with large thumbs are said to be more likely to possess native intelligence, while the small thumbs indicate feeling.

For the past ten years the owner of a flour mill at Dubuque has had a sign on his fire proof safe reading: "No money in here. Please call at the house." It was intended for burglars, and the other night one called at the house and secured $1,870.

Queen Victoria is very fond of straw hats. She recently had a photograph taken of herself as she sat at breakfast surrounded by her family. On her head was a most remarkable straw hat, the most striking object in the picture.

A Biddeford, Me., family had beefsteak for supper the other night, and while sawing away on a piece that seemed tougher than usual, one of the family found an army and navy cent firmly imbedded in the meat. It is supposed the cent was shot into the ox and that the wound had afterward healed.

It is stated that the cost of making converts to Christianity in Chicago averages $394,235 per convert. In addition to this there is the expense for the constant and necessary repairs. So when you come in contact with a Chicago Christian you want to handle him as you would a peachblow vase.

The scent of bloodhounds is dull compared with that of certain male moths. Mr. C. H. Plesse, in a late work, states that if a newly-emersed female Saturnia carpini is placed in a closed box the males will come from nearly a mile away, though hills and buildings intervene, and have even found their way down a chimney to the object of their search.

While workmen were digging a trench across the Boston common their spades struck against some hard substance, and upon excavating further a human bone was brought to light. Work was then continued more carefully until an entire skeleton of a man was seen. It was in a fairly good state of preservation, and was not badly disjointed. The bones are supposed to be those of an Indian.

A speaker at a meeting of the old settlers of Clayton county, Iowa, gave a fair sample of the situation generally: "Not a point on the present continent was so isolated as was Clayton county forty or fifty years ago. The speaker said he could recall when there was but one top buggy in Cass township. Now every young man had a top buggy if it was all covered with a chattle mortgage, and every house had a piano or organ even if there was no one in it that could play Yankee Doodle."

A banker's clerk residing in Rudolfsheim suburb of Vienna had the misfortune to lose his third wife a month ago. Each of his three wives left him a child and also a mother-in-law, with all of whom he was on good terms. Somehow, however, they did not manage to get on with one another. They used to meet sometimes at his house, where they came to see him and his children. Recently the three mothers-in-law quarreled as usual, and a pitch battle ensued. All three intend, it is said, to take legal proceedings, and subpœna their son-in-law as a witness.

A Belfast, Me., woman has found a way to dispose of money with holes punched in it. She recently offered one to a merchant there, not with the shame-faced or hurried manner in which such coins are often offered, but reluctantly, asserting that it was a keepsake, and she would not part with it for any money, but would leave it provided the merchant would promise to keep it until she should call for it, which she promised to do within a week. The merchant took the keepsake, delivered her goods, and gave back the necessary change for $5, and the customer departed and has not been seen since. The merchant is about 50 cents out.

CONDENSED NEWS.

Washington News.

Information secured at the war department, indicates that an army officer will at least be a member of the Sioux commission, and it is asserted that Gen. Ruger has been appointed. Gen. Cook was at first designated, but he asked to be excused, and was excused. It is hinted that an official of the Indian office, perhaps Larrabee, will make the second member, and that the third will be the Indian agent at the agency where the negotiations are being carried.

It is reported at Washington as coming from army officers at some of the posts along the Missouri that a very hostile feeling has developed among the Sioux to the proposed opening of the Great Sioux reservation. While the authorities at the war department would not admit it, it is stated that warnings have been sent from officials commanding these posts that a larger number of the younger Indians stand ready to go upon the warpath if any attempt is made to open the reservation, and that even an attempt to secure the consent of the leading Indians may end in bloodshed and serious danger to the whites who live along the Missouri river. While a good deal of this sounds like sensationalism, it was admitted at the Indian office that some very strong opposition would have to be encountered.

The Casualty Record.

Kansas City was visited by a disastrous cloud-burst, causing heavy wash-outs and undermining several houses. Several serious accidents occurred, owing to the almost impassable condition of the streets, the actual facts are not obtainable. So sudden was the cloud-burst that six persons sick with malarial fever in the storm district were with difficulty rescued by the firemen in a drowning condition.

William Gratz, aged fourteen years, and two sons of Fred Stricker, aged about eight and ten, were poisoned by eating a plant at Lake Benton, Minn. One of the younger boys first felt the effects and gave the alarm. Mrs. Gratz hastened to the place and found her son unconscious. The boy was carried to the house, where he was seized with convulsions and died in a few moments. Antidotes were administered to the two younger boys, but they are very sick and may die.

A frightful wreck occurred on the Louisville, New Albany & Chicago railroad, three miles south of Lafayette. An extra freight, running at high speed to make the grade, dashed into a land slide, which covered the track for nearly 100 feet. The engine was completely demolished, and fourteen cars piled up to a height of thirty feet. David Julian, a brakeman, met instant death. Thomas Harnett received fatal injuries, and Fireman Blackwell was so badly hurt internally that recovery is impossible. The loss to the company is heavy.

At a meeting of District Assembly 48, Knights of Labor, Cincinnati it was announced that Recording Secretary Jesse S. Jones had become a defaulter to the amount of several thousand dollars and had left the city.

Charles Gordon, a sheep herder, employed by F. F. Ralston for the past year, shot and instantly killed John Labelle near Choteau, Montana. He was arrested and placed in jail under a strong guard. Labelle was twenty-two years old, steady and quiet, and lately arrived from California. His parents reside at San Buena Ventura, Cal. No cause for the crime is known.

At the Winnebago Indian agency in Nebraska, a young woman from St. Paul arrived to take a position as teacher in the agency school. That evening, while out walking, she was assaulted and outraged by eighteen Winnebago bucks. The victim is a pretty French woman named Leonora Thibedeau, and she now lies in a very critical state.

The woman, Mary Wachel, who was shot some weeks ago, at Manitowoc, Wis., made a full confession to a priest that she did the shooting herself with suicidal intent. She says her reason for doing the deed was because she was seduced by a young man named Joseph Decker. Decker does not deny the accusation. This will release Cemfeldt the man who was arrested on suspicion. The girl will recover.

The body of an unknown woman was found in the river opposite Louisville, Ky. The woman's throat was cut, the feet were bound together and a huge stone attached to the body as a sinker. The body had on a skirt, a basque and a pair of stockings, all of cheap material. It was that of a person about thirty years old, and had short brown hair. The features were so distorted by decomposition that they can afford little help in identification.

Seventeen arrests for selling liquor without license were made at Sioux Falls, D. T., two injunctions served and nine other warrants issued for the same offense. Some days ago an assault was made on one of the informers who have been furnishing evidence against the saloonkeepers, and it was supposed the assailant was a saloon man or some one hired by them. But it was developed that the assault was made by B. H. Craig, who became intoxicated, and is now in jail. If he was hired by the saloon men it is thought he will confess.

Capt. Ernst F. Herzberg, one of the Milwaukee sewer inspectors, shot himself. He was seventy-one years of age. He married Augusta Ramien, a sister of Henry Ramien, but they were divorced many years ago. His domestic troubles led Capt. Herzberg to make a murderous assault on his brother-in-law, Charles Ramien, whom he shot in July, 1875. He was convicted of assault with intent to kill, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. He served that sentence, and since his discharge from prison his life has apparently been most unhappy.

An insurance company in Milwaukee was robbed of a large amount of money in the old sneak thief game. The thieves were subsequently arrested about twelve miles from Milwaukee and one of them proved to be the king of bank sneak thieves, Rufus Miller, alias "Little Rufe." Rufe is considered among detectives as being the cutest and most daring sneak thief connected with the fraternity of sneak thieves. It was he who was connected with the James H. Young bank robbery in New York, when, with a confederate, he got away with $50,000. He was also engaged with Billy Bark in the Bank of Commerce robbery, when $30,000 in securities were stolen.

The record of the female convict, from Sioux City to the Fort Madison penitentiary, under the assumed name of Charles Miller is extraordinary. The woman had lived at Sioux City nearly six years, and succeeded in passing herself off as a man all the time, and was supposed to be the husband of the woman with whom she lived. She worked as a farm hand for several years. Moving to town, she became a barber, and later she and her supposed wife adopted a girl baby, and, at the time of her arrest for horse stealing she had both the wife and the baby in the carriage, which she secured from a livery stable, with which she was attempting to escape. While she was confined in jail in crowded quarters with male prisoners her sex was not discovered.

Foreign News.

The training squadron, consisting of four cruisers and 14 torpedo boats, will accompany the ironclads selected to form the escort to Emperor William on his Russian trip. It is announced that Prince Henry will have supreme command of the fleet. This indicates a previous rearrangement of the naval commands.

Dr. Mackenzie, in an interview at Paris, said he was glad to leave Berlin, where his movements were closely watched. "Empress Victoria," he said, "was surrounded by spies after the death of Emperor Frederick. I was confined at Potsdam for several hours. Emperor William's conduct was odd altogether. I almost think his aural malady has affected his brain. I can say nothing of the late emperor's memoirs. It is untrue that Queen Victoria carried them off."

Personal Notes.

There is much wonderment about an applicant who wishes to become a citizen of the United States. The case is that of Lieut. Col. Leslie Smith, commanding the post at Fort Maginnis, who for thirty years has been an officer of the United States army, and has never been entitled to the right of suffrage. This must be the only case of its kind known in the United States Army.

Samuel J. Randall is a very sick man. He has been in poor health all winter and is in a much more serious condition than his most intimate friends have supposed. His frequent absences from Congress have been noted, but the cause has not been understood. He has been a frequent and a great sufferer from gout, and during the present congress he has been afflicted with hemorrhoids. Recently he has had a severe surgical operation in Philadelphia to relieve him from this trouble and his present illness is directly attributed to this cause.

The annual twin city directories are now out, and every body is using the number of names as a basis for estimating the population. The St. Paul directory contains 70,234 names, which show a population of something like 175,000. The Minneapolis book contains 74,350 names and a population of 185,000.

Senator D. M. Sabin and Charles N. Nelson have been made the defendants in a suit brought in the district court at St. Paul by the Massachusetts Loan and Trust company to recover $100,000 on a promissory note. The complaint states that the note was executed by Seymour, Sabin & Co. on June 11, 1882 and was endorsed by Dwight M. Sabin and Charles N. Nelson individually. It was made payable on demand at the Fourth National bank of New York city, but payment was refused.

An attempt has been made to suppress all news concerning the alleged insubordination at the state penitentiary at Lincoln, Nebraska, and its causes, but some interesting facts came to light recently. A few months ago Warden Hyers was suspended by the governor and a deputy put in his place. This resulted in considerable feeling between the executive and boards and jealousy between the warded and his deputy. These facts became known to the convicts and one day forty-eight of them refused to work. Trouble was feared, and the board of public lands and buildings gave the warden free power over the penitentiary. There is now liable to be a conflict between the governor on one side and the board and the warden on the other.

Elopers Arrested.

Henry W. Moore, ex-manager of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and Mrs. John W. Norton were arrested at Topeka, Kansas, where they had registered as W. H. Mason and wife, Philadelphia. They were in their room at the Copeland hotel when the chief of police and his deputy arrived with the warrant. The officers were admitted to the room, and before any conversation had been had, and without questioning them as to their identity, the warrants were read to them, charging them with grand larceny.

"You are now in my custody," said the officer, "and you may accompany me to the county jail, where we will take good care of you until the parties from St. Louis arrive."

No sooner had the warrant been read than Mrs. Norton broke into tears and cried bitterly. Moore placed his arm about her and attempted to console her, but she continued to sob for several moments. Moore then appealed to the officer not to take them to jail, and said: "It will break her heart." The chief at first declared that they must go, but finally consented that they might remain in their room at the hotel under surveillance of an officer.

"All we took," she said, "was $3,500, which was my own money and my jewelry. I do not see what he (Norton) expects to make out of this. I would have gone into his house Friday night, but he threatened my life. I do not want to die yet. He said he would kill me. Friends came out of the house and said he was flourishing a butcher knife."

"I tell you what I would do," said Mr. Moore, "I would go right back to St. Louis and face whatever music there is. We can prove then that no money was stolen."

"But he will kill me," said Mrs. Norton.

"You can put him under bonds," volunteered Officer Gardiner, "he has threatened your life."

"Officer," said Mr. Moore, "you see our valices; you see we have touched nothing. That is my satchel."

"And this is mine," said Mrs. Norton, (taking up the other one) and what it contains is mine."

When the officer inquired what led to the elopement Norton said he had nothing to say at this time. He was somewhat nervous, and acted like a man who had either been foiled in a plot or regretted what he had done and had lost heart to carry it to consumation. He said the charges against him and Mrs. Norton were unfounded. They brought nothing belonging to others away with them. They had not $40,000; he wished they had $10,000. Since he came here he and his companion had gone about the city much the same as any strangers visiting the city would.

Judge Keeler presented to Judge Guthrie, of Shawnee county district court, a petetion for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of his clients, Henry W. Moore and Mrs. Emma S. Norton. Moore and Mrs. Norton are under police surveillance at the Copeland hotel. Judge McLaughlin, attorney for Mr. Norton and Mrs. Caswell, an intimate friend of Mrs. Norton, arrived from St. Louis and went immediately to the Copeland hotel, where Mrs. Caswell, after some strong and bitter words to Mr. Moore, made an earnest appeal to Mrs. Norton to return to St. Louis. She refused and Mrs. Caswell left her. Mrs. Norton received three telegrams in from friends in Baltimore, offering her any assistance in their power to give. While Moore was out of the hotel in charge of an officer, Mrs. Norton talked freely and said some things which have caused much surprise and given rise to much doubt among many of Mr. Norton's friends. The madame is reported to have said:

I would never have left St Louis with Mr. Moore had my husband not threatened to take my life. When I went to my home they told me that Norton would kill me, and it was in fear of my life that I left. No other woman but myself could have lived with him ten years and I fairly worshiped him, but his treatment of me was that of a brute. He cursed me, he beat me and dragged me about like a dog, and yet I lived with him because I loved him, because I thought his heart would change. I don't believe there is a man in St. Louis who has the unbearable and uncontrollable temper that Norton has. At times he is like a madman. He never had cause to think of me as other than a loving and dutiful wife, for I was most devoted to him in every day of my life. When he was sick I never left his bedside, but watched him day after day and night after night until I was almost wasted away. Then those statements that Mr. Moore had been visiting our house daily are the most malicious lies. Why he has not, during the three months we lived there, set foot within my house. Then those stories that we have stolen Mr. Norton's money are just awful. I have not one cent of Norton's money and he knows it. He knows I never had his money. I have about $3,500 of my own money which is all I have got, and our arrest on the charge of grand larceny in stealing $20,000 is preposterous.

Foreseeing Danger Ahead.

Mr. Hoar spoke in the senate in opposition to the fisheries treaty. He said:

The desire of Canada and Great Britain to contract within the least possible limits the fishing ground to which America shall have access and to posess themselves without obstruction of the calling which brought to the great American market its supply of fish for food and fish oils, has a vastly larger purpose than a mere struggle for profitable industry. England has already taken possession of all the great routes of commerce, and is now adding the land route across Canada. To keep open this imperial highway at both extremities, the 60,000 fishermen of the dominion must form an almost indispensable element of the greatest strength. They would issue out from Halifax at one end of the great continental line, and from Vancovers island at the other, forming in time of war a perpetual menace to commerce and coasts of the United States. This was a struggle on the part of Great Britian and Canada to increase their naval strength and diminish that of the United States, to increase the numbers of a naval school whose graduates would be a constant threat to American commerce in time of war, both on the Atlantic and Pacific.

Mr. Hoar covered some of the familiar lines of opposition to the treaty, referred to the old-time glory of the American flag, and said the rejection of this treaty would be in the interest of a true, thorough and lasting peace, and criticised the administration, mentioning incidentally crimes at Southern elections and the tariff question.

MARK H. DUNNELL.

This Veteran Nominated for Congress in the First Minnesota District.

The Republicans of the First Minnesota congressional district met in convention at Rochester, and spent two days in a friendly struggle over a candidate for Congress, the nomination being now by Mark H. Dunnell on the twenty-fifth ballot. The first ballot stood: Dunnell, 25; Mullen, 18; Conkey, 16; Daniels, 9; Start, 6; Lincoln, 1; and Braden, 1. The last ballot gave Dunnell, the requisto 40; Conkey 14; and Mullen 5; Leonard 17.

THE PLATFORM.

The resolutions adopted proclaim adherence to the principles of the Republican party, warmly indorse the Chicago nominees and platform; declare sympathy with labor and its needs; approve the law enacted by the last legislature for a more just rate of transportation on all agricultural products and implements and recommend the further extension of the system of state and national control over railroads. The resolutions conclude:

Resolved, That in the imposition of duties on foreign imports we demand such revision of our present tariff laws as will correct all inequalities therein and relieve the tax payers to the fullest possible extent without injury to the cause of American labor or menacing the prosperity of the great producing interests of the country, and we would respectfully invite the attention of the voters of this district to the fact that all revision of our tariff legislation of the war period has been effected by the Republican party; and we declare our implicit confidence in its ability and sincere purpose to the effect in the future such reductions of our national revenues and the readjusting of our tariff laws as will be most conducive to the welfare of the varied industries and interests of the American people.

Resolved, That we heartily approve the system adoption to the Republican party in providing for the defenders of our country and in the payment of liberal pensions and we declare in favor of a policy for protecting and giving fostering care to these soldiers, their widows and orphans. That we denounce as unjust, and inequitable the course pursued by the president of the indiscriminate vetoing of private pension bills.

Resolved, That we condemn the action of our present representative in congress in uniting with the Southern brigadiers in their opposition to and final defeat of the bill passed by the United States senate to refund to the several states of the Union the amount of the direct war tax to which they are each justly entitled, thus denying to the people of our state their just due to the extent of $108,000.

Resolved, That we pledge to the nominee of this convention our earnest, united and most loyal support, and we invite the hearty co-operation of all patriotic citizens and especially all working men, whose prosperity is seriously threatened by the free trade policy of the present administration.

The resolutions were received with hearty applause, and by a rising vote the report was unanimously adopted.

Quite a deal of enthusiasm for Dunnell manifested itself in the convention hall after the nomination was made.

DAKOTA DEMOCRACY.

J. W. Harden Nominated for Congress by the Jamestown Convention.

Over two hundred delegates and three times as many spectators were seated in the opera house at Jamestown when Judge Bangs, chairman of the territorial central committee, rapped the territorial Democratic convention to order. Martin Ryan of Fargo was chosen temporary chairman, and on taking the chair made a speech, confined almost entirely to the exposition of the Democratic party's position on the tariff question. He made a flattering reference to Gov. Church, stating that when his entire administration shall be viewed in its completed light the result will be one of which Church can be proud of.

Unexpected interest developed when the South Dakota delegates arrived and commenced their canvass for Harden, who has all through been the leading candidate. His chances for nomination, however, were seriously jeopardized by his hasty expression in favor of division. Upon hearing this Nostbern, a one state man aided by Col. Stole, of Deadwood, attempted to counteract the Harden notion, and succeeded so well that he was induced to qualify his statement and agee to stand on the admission-as-a-whole platform, supplemented by a clause favoring the final decision of the matter by the vote of the people, and expressing his willingness to abide by that decision.

At the evening session Col. Steele, chairman of the committee, read the platform, which declares fealty to Democratic principles, endorses the action of the Democratic convention at St. Louis, supports the platform, and is especially strong in its indorsement of the tariff plank. It approves the action of Gov. Church in refusing to allow expenditures in excess of appropriations for territorial institutions; declares in favor of equalized taxation, and approves the action of the territorial administration in taxing railroad lands hitherto claimed to be not taxable. It favors the admission of the territory as one state, with a provision in the enabling act providing that an election which shall be final may be had on the division question after admission. It arraigns the Republican party for obstructing admission, and points with pride to the administrations of President Cleveland and Gov. Church. Otto Peemilller of Yankton, introduced as an amendment to the platform a resolution declaring that the liquor traffic can best be regulated by high license. The resolution was laid on table by almost a unanimous vote. When nominations for delegate to congress were declared in order C. L. Hindley, of Beadle county, took the floor and placed in nomination John W. Harden, of Jerauld county. Harden was declared the convention's nominee by acclamation.

The territorial central committee was selected and Martin Ryan, of Fargo, elected chairman, and O. S. Kemp, of Watertown, secretary. The Sixth and Twelfth districts failed to agree on a member, and with these exceptions the committee is as follows: Charles Freeman, Otto Peemiller, G. S. Matthews, Dave Gledden, F. M. Hammen, George Henry, J. E. Carpenter, T. W. Child, A. H. Gast, J. H. Hilger, James Ringrose, A. H. Marsh, C. L. Wood, W. B. Thornby, Ben Bear, Alex F. Walker, J. K. Van Neida, G. B. Namandygham, John De Groat, F. R. Fulton, M. K. Merriam, W. W. Miller, A. J. McCabe, L. W. Harriman, Joseph Hare, George Peepes and James Collster.

Punishment of Bribery.

The rulings of law in the Chicago anarchist's case, by Judge Gary, that sent Spies and his comrades to the gallows, were turned by another Chicago judge, Kirk Haws, against the agents, attorneys and chief officials of one of the weathiest corporations in that country. The offense in this case was attempted jury bribing, and the main offender Sumner C. Welch, claim agent of the Chicago City railway, is sentenced to a term behind prisen bars, while C. H. Holmes, president of the company, and C. M. Hardy, the company's attorney, are recommended to be dealt with by the grand jury. Judge Haws holds that the conspiracy rulings in the anarchist case applies as well to any other conspirators. In rendering his decision he sent Welch to jail for six months, and held that it was not necessary that Holmes or Hardy should have done any positive or affirmative act, or be present when it was done, if they in any way aid or abetted, and that if they did so aid or abet they were as guilty as the actual criminal. The question as to whether Homes or Hardy actually did abet he left to the grand jury, recommending that it investigate their cases. The Chicago City railway is perhaps the largest corporation of the kind in the country. President Homes is a very prominent, wealthy citizen, and Attorney Hardy is a leading member of the bar. The bribery was in an insignificant little damage suit against the company, Welch approaching one of the jurors named Rosenthal during a court recess, and endeavoring to retain by money his service in the interest of the company. Rosenthal indignantly refused, voted for the highest verdict against the corporation, and afterwards exposed the business to the attorneys for the plaintiff. The matter raised a storm of public opinion. It was shown that this course had been pursued for years in other litigation. The judge in recommending Hardy and Holmes to the grand jury said enough had been shown to establish a reasonable ground for belief that they had a general knowledge of Welch's crimes and indirectly encouraged him, winking at his infamy. The sentence of Welch is only for his contempt of court, and he with Hardy and Holmes are liable, if their guilt is formally established before a jury in the regular way, to a long term of hard labor in the penitentiary.

Waseca's Chautauqua.

The Chautauqua assembly meeting at Waseca, Minn., are largely attended, the interest has been greater than ever before, and the programs daily furnished are of an unusually high character.

Prof. Casper delivered a lecture on the antislavery movement, in which he gave a detailed account of the movement, with its consequences.

Miss Mercer is doing good work in her physical culture class. The C. L. S. C. class was favored by a talk from J. DeWitt Miller on the British customs and more particularly a description of the house of commons, its prominent members and their peculiarities.

J. D. Miller delivered a lecture on "Our Country, Its Possibilities and Perils." He paid a grand tribute to H. W. Beecher. He predicted a meeting of the British lion and the Russian bear. He thought our country, if not the garden of Eden, was just over the fence.

Prof. Case's concert called out a large audience. Many of the singers were applauded, among them Miss Carrington, who was warmly greeted when she appeared. She seems to please the public immensely.

Leon H. Vincent gave a lecture on the "Life of Hawthorne." After the singing school a small delegation of Knights Templar in uniform marched into the tabernacle, lead by Commander Backman. Miss Carrington sang a solo and Dr. Charles Griswold of St. Paul delivered an address in behalf of the Knights. He gave some very excellent comment. He said he never knew of a person being asked to become a Knight. They never proselyte. He made some very keen comments on the anti-secret society cranks. He showed the grand work the Knights are doing in relieving suffering and sickness. Leon H. Vincent gave the C. L. S. C. round-table class a talk on book reading and the books we should read by all means, which are as follows: Chaucer's, Shakespeare's, Miltons, Addison's, Gulliver's Travels, Dr. Johnson's, some of Elliot's, Reade's, Dickens', Meredith's, Wordsworth's Tennyson's and Browning's.

Frank E. Newton pleaded guilty of forgery in the district court at Watertown, D. T. His sentence was three years in the penitentiary. This is the young man who was arrested a few hours before his marriage some months ago.

A terrible accident occurred on the Virginia Midland railroad. The through Southern train from Alexandria went through a trestle between Orange Court House and Barboursville, killing five persons outright and wounding upwards of twenty-five. The trestle, which was forty-eight feet high, was known to be weak and the railroad company was engaged in filling it in. The train was moving a speed of six miles an hour. The engine had passed safely over most of the trestle, when the smoker, mail, baggage and express cars went down, dragging the engine and two passenger coaches. Two sleepers remained on the trestle.

It is stated that Judge John V. Wright, of Tennessee; Rev. W. N. Cleveland, brother of the President, and Capt. R. H. Pratt, superintendent of the Carlisle Indian school, will constitute the commission to negotiate with the Sioux Indians for a division of their reservation in Dakota and a surrender of a part to the United States.

The German police have ordered Queen Natalie of Servia to leave Germany within twenty-four hours. An officer attended by twenty policemen, entered Queen Natalie's villa at Weisbaden, and shortly after reappeared with the young prince Alexander and a lady of honor of the queen's suite. The two were driven to the railway station, where the prince was handed over to M. Protics, the Servian police who left with him for Belgrade. When the queen received notice from the police that she must part with her son, she telegraphed to King Milan, imploring him to allow the boy to remain with her another month. The king, however, was incensed at the abrupt manner with which the queen had refused his conciliatory proposal for meditation, and telegraphed back to the crown prince's tutor that the boy must not remain with the queen a day longer.

Parnell will accept the government's offer and introduce a bill providing for the appointment of a committee of judges to investigate the Times' charges against the members of the Irish parliamentary party. His acceptance of the proposal, however, will be subject to rigid conditions regarding the judges to be appointed and the scope of investigation.

Verres W. Smith, son-in-law of the late Horace Greely, was a prisoner in the Yorkville court New York, charged by John Allen, proprietor of the Hotel Hamilton, with defrauding him out of $315, the amount of Mr. Smith's bill for board and lodgings.

Ebenezer Stanyard the Youngstown, Ohio, murderer, who killed his sweetheart, Alice Hancock, early in 1887, was hanged in the penitentiary annex. He played his accordeon before going to the scaffold and appeared to be at his ease. The crime for which he suffered was a brutal one, the pretty young girl being shot from behind, and all on account of jealousy.

Dr. Ingersoll, dean of the dental faculty, at Iowa City, appeared before the investigating committee in the "boodle" case against Dr. Hunt. He censured Hunt severely as secretary and treasurer. Hunt had kept no records no proper accounts. He had concealed original bills and vouchers for the purpose of making way with the state money. Hunt was on the stand explaining his books and was subjected to a sharp cross-examination. It appeared that Hunt had used $800 for lobbying expenses at Des Moines.

Gen. Boulanger was wounded in the arm and neck. M. Floquet's hand was simply scratched by Gen. Boulanger's sword in the duel which followed the scene in the chambers. M. Floquet's colleagues in the ministry were overjoyed to see the prime minister return safely. He was given an ovation. A small crowd of Gen. Boulanger's followers were in front of his house when he reached home. Regarding the details of the duel it is said that after the sword encounter, which had resulted in a slight wound on the hand of M. Floquet, they both renewed the fighting and Gen. Boulanger made a lunge at M. Floquet's left breast, only slightly touching the mark. Gen. Boulanger then received a wound in the throat, which put an end to the encounter. The duel lasted only four minutes.

Gustave Johnson, of Price county, Wisconsin, tied his little son to a post with a chain and beat him nearly to death. Instead of releasing him after the flogging he left him to suffer from his wounds till the next night, when the little fellow succeeded in making his escape to the woods, where he remained for two days without food or shelter. He was discovered by a Wisconsin Central section crew nearly exhausted with hunger. He reported his parents' cruelty to the men, and the latter, with other citizens, visited Johnson, and with a rope proceeded to elevate him to a tree limb. He begged for his life and, promising never to whip the boy again, was lowered, and after receiving a flogging, was marched to a railroad water tank and given a bath. The boy is now in the cure of the people of the settlement.

George Wright, colored, who killed a rival named Charley Dorsey, in a house of questionable repute at Milwaukee, was given a life sentence. The Schaefer homicide case resulted in a verdict sentencing Schaefer to two years' hard labor in the house of correction.

Word has reached Frenchburg, Ky., from Red river of a tragedy that occurred there. Harvey Pike was to marry Mira Haskins. For some weeks a young man named Everhard from Philadelphia has been about the place, and boarded at Haskins'. He and Miss Haskins became great friends. Pike became exceedingly jealous of the stranger. One night he found them out walking. What passed between them will never be known. They were found dead, Everhard with a shot in the head, Miss Haskins' head had been crushed by a bludgeon and Pike with a bullet hole in the side of his mouth, whence he had sent it into his brain.

REPUBLICAN POLITICS.

Almost Satisfied.

We've got the declaration of independence, the star spangled banner and Ben Harrison. What we want is the White house, and then we will be happy.—St. Louis Star.

Deserts a Sinking Ship.

Hon. William E. Moses, a prominent merchant of Northfield, Minn., and heretofore a leader among the Democratic hosts of the Third district in this section, has resigned his position as chairman of the Democratic city committee. He gave as his reason that he would not support Cleveland and Thurman in the coming contest.

They Go Together.

The republican party believes in protecting the flax industries of the United States. The democrats believe in throwing open our ports to "free trade." Free trade means flax from England's India. Free flax would kill the flax raising business in Dakota. Free flax and death to Dakota are democratic war cries. They both go together.—St. Lawrence (D. T.) Journal.

The Republican Candidates.

Gen. Harrison owes little of his ancestry. He has won at every step of his career, because he has been a true, nobly ambitious, patriotic, courageous, capable and growing man. Whether as lawyer, or soldier, or statesman, he has always done his duty, and always been true to his character and convictions as a Christian gentleman. The best record of his career is to be found in his published expressions as to the questions that have tested his adequacy to the high positions he has occupied, in the halls of national legislation and the political campaign where great issues were decided. Of Mr. Morton and his long and honorable career it is needless to speak in this community, where he has been known in all ways and by all men. His nomination should issue the electorical votes of New York beyond question.

A Frightened Democrat.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says that Congressman Vance, Democrat, of Connecticut, is a frightened man. He concedes the Republicans 182 electoral votes, and says: "There is no use in our claiming any of those votes; they are always Republican and more apt to be so now than at any other time, on account of the tariff issue. Accepting this as a starting point, then it is only necessary for the republicans to secure nineteen more votes in order to carry the election. Fifteen of these they expect to get in Indiana and six from Connecticut, and that carries the day. Now, the question to my mind is, can this be prevented? As to Indiana, I only know what is told me by the Indiana Democrats. They do not even pretend to say that they have any surety of a successful issue in that State, but, on the contrary, are very much alarmed about the outcome. This being the case, it becomes absolutely necessary for us to carry Connecticut. It will make no difference what kind of a majority New York gives Cleveland. It will make no difference how New Jersey will go. Unless we carry Connecticut Harrison will be elected.

"Now, I have just returned from my State and am very much worried over the outlook. The people are for protection before they are for anything else, and I hear a good many Democrats talking in a doubtful way about supporting the ticket on account of the Mills bill. The cry of free trade has frightened them, and among their number are some very intelligent men—men you would suppose would not talk unless they knew what they were talking about."

Harrison and Cleveland—1861 to 1865.

When the civil war broke out, Benjamin Harrison had a wife and two children, lived in a house worth $2,900 on which he had made a small payment and needed his position as Reporter of the Supreme Court in addition to his scant law practice, to support his family. His situation was such that he did not feel called on to volunteer. But when the reverses of 1862 made it necessary to call for 500,000 men, the situation was changed. Heroic Gov. Morton was discouraged by the prevailing apathy and he asked Harrison to raise a regiment. Harrison at once responded that he could and would raise a regiment. The Governor said: "I feel certain that you can raise a regiment, but I would not ask you to do more than that. I know your situation, and would not think of asking you to go yourself."

To this Harrison promptly and characteristically replied: "Of course I shall go. I would not put myself in the ridiculous position of going out to make war speeches and to urge my neighbors to go where I would not go myself."

Without consultation with his wife or with any friend, but with the energy and singleness of purpose that is one of his best traits, he went directly from the Governor's office to a store, where he bought a military hat, and then hired a fifer and drummer and set them to work in front of his office; raised a company in a few days, and within thirty days was at the head of a full regiment at Bowling Green, Kentucky, to help in the repulse of Gen. Kirby Smith, who had been threatening Southern Indiana with a raid. The spirit that characterized the descendant of a line of soldiers was recognized by that able and quick appreciator of fighting qualities, "Fighting Joe Hooker," who saw Harrison, at Peachtree Creek, when, without orders, he charged up hill against the rebels under Hood, and so effectually that Hooker promised him on the spot that he would make him a Brigadier for that day's work.

So Hooker sent this concise but glowing recommendation:

The Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War: I desire to call the attention of the department to the claims of Col. Benjamin Harrison, of the Seventieth Indiana Volunteers, for promotion to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers.

Col. Harrison first joined me in command of a brigade of Ward's division in Lookout valley preparatory to entering upon what is called the campaign of Atlanta. My attention was first attracted to this young officer by the superior excellence of his brigade in discipline and instruction, the result of his labor, skill and devotion. With more foresight than I have witnessed in any offices of his experience, he seemed to act upon the principle that success depended upon the thorough preparation in discipline and esprit of his command for conflict more than on any influence that could be exerted in the field itself, and when the collision came his command vindicated his wisdom as much as his valor. In all the achievements of the Twentieth Corps in that campaign Col. Harrison bore a conspicuous part. At Resaca and Peach tree Creek the conduct of himself and command were especially distinguished. Col. Harrison is an officer of superior abilities and of great professional and personal worth. It gives me great favor to commend him favorably to the honorable Secretary with the assurance that his preferment will be a just recognition of his services and martial accomplishments. Respectfully your obedient servant.

JOSEPH HOOKER, Major-General Commanding.

Such praise for superb fighting qualities, by such a splendid judge of them as Hooker, is worth whole columns of details as to the honorable, consistent and noble military career of Gen. Harrison, and we therefore have made it conspicuous.

Such is the war record of Benjamin Harrison.

How does it compare with that of the Buffalo lawyer, Grover Cleveland, who was so stolid, apathetic and unpatriotic that there is no record as to his ever having uttered a single word in public, showing his preference for the Union over the rebel cause, or his sympathy with gallant neighbors and townsmen in the field, or concern for the triumph of the Union cause? How many other men who for various reasons, remained at home during the war, and had any sort of social or other standing, were so organized that they could remain all through those thrilling times without giving any public evidence of their patriotic emotion?

Hundreds of thousands of just as patriotic Northern men as went to the front had good reasons for remaining in their paths of home duty and usefulness, but can any one of our readers, out of all his circle of acquaintances, remember any case of terror, numbness and silence, during periods when even the most apathetic became active and the dullest and dumbest were most vociferous, at all comparable with that of Grover Cleveland?

Thus the two men were contrasted—or were brought out—in "the time that tried men's souls." Look at their war records. Study them. Compare them, and then recollect what a terrible and prolonged trial of Northern manhood, and patriotism it was.—New York Mail and Express.

A Live Man Packed in Ice.

From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Simpson traveled on horseback to a landing on the upper Missouri, and boarded a boat bound for St. Louis. He had not traveled far when his suspicions were aroused by the acts of half a dozen men on the boat. At least once a day, and sometimes oftener, the boat would stop near a sand-bar, and these men, getting off the boat, would hastily dig a hole in the sand, throwing into it some object, cover it up, and then hastening on deck, the boat would again resume its trip toward St. Louis.

"Who are you, and what is it you are doing on those sand-bars?" finally asked Simpson of one who appeared to be the leader of this particular crew.

"I have charge of the death crew," he replied.

"Death crew?" replied Simpson in a startled manner. "What do you mean by that?"

"Why, stranger, don't you know that the cholera is all over the country, and thousands of people are dying every day?"

This was news to Simpson, so isolated a life he had been leading in the Rocky mountains, and he hurriedly inquired:

"Is there cholera on this boat?"

"Yes," replied the boatman, "and they are dying pretty fast. Look out, stranger, your time may come next. This was emphasized by the boat again stopping and another corpse hastily buried in a sand-bar.

The next day Simpson was attacked with the cholera, and lying down near the smoke-stack thought his time had come. One of the death crew coming and rolled him over, and, giving him a shove with his foot, caused Simpson to utter a cry of pain.

"Not dead yet," uttered the boatman, "his time will soon come." The boatman was starting away when he heard. Simpson faintly cry out: "Come back." The boatman returned and Simpson said: "Tell the captain or clerk of the boat that I wish to see him."

The officer came, and raising upon his elbow, Simpson began to gasp out: I don't want to be buried on a sandbar on the Mississippi river and be eaten by the catfish. I am very sick and don't think I can live long. I want you to take my body to St. Louis for burial. I have a little gold dust," continued Simpson, handing it to the officer, "here take, it. If that is not enough my father in St. Louis will see that you are liberally paid."

"What's your father's name?"

"Simpson."

"His full name?"

"My God, man!" said the officer, "Dr. Simpson is my family physician, and you—you are his long lost son George. Why, I have heard more talk about you than any other young man that ever left St. Louis."

Simpson was given the best of care, but after going through a terrible paroxysm of pain, was considered dead, and the officer had his body packed away in a box and covered with ice. Some time after one of the crew, passing near the box, saw the ice moving, and then piece after piece of ice was crowded over the sides of the box. Hastening to the office, he shouted out: "That dead man is coming to life." Simpson had only fainted away, and was not dead. He finally reached St. Louis, and his reception at the old home was indeed a royal one.

SUING THE SHAKERS.

A Woman's Successful Demand for Money.

The New York Times says: Judge Alton B, Parker, of Kingston, who is holding part II of the Supreme Court, special term, this week, tried a suit between an ex-Shakeress and the United Brotherhood of Shakers. The Plaintiff is neither fat nor fair, but she is forty. She testified that she entered what she called the North Brotherhood of Shakers, at Lebanon, N. Y., in 1862, when she was sixteen years old, and staid with them until 1882. She told a melancholy tale of hard work and self-denial. She said that they made a perfect drudge of her and vexed her mind even more than her body by telling her that she would go to hell if she had rebellious thoughts. "I had them every day for all that," she said, "and then I would be frightned almost to death at what I had done." Her suit was to recover $1,000, which her father sent her from time to time, and which the trustees of the brotherhood appropriated to the common use, in pursuance with the terms of a covenant which she signed when she joined it before she was of age. Benj. Yates and another member of the board of trustees were present as defendants, dressed in strict Shaker garb. Miss May Charlotte Byrdsall, the plaintiff, has cast off the Shaker garb and was dressed in a youthful and lively manner. Her testimony satisfied the defendants' lawyers that they had no case, and a compromise was effected by which they paid her $800, with which Miss Byrdsall departed smiling.

Counsel in Season.

A murrian on the evil-eyed physician who twangs away on his broken harp the same old discordant tune about the dangers that encompass the man who drinks ice water in the summer. He is sounding his loud timbrel in great shape this year, and deserves a fitting punishment. The journal does not pose as a medical adviser, but it would advise its gentle readers to make tracks for the nearest water cooler when they are thirsty and pour enough melted ice in them to refresh them and make them feel as though they were spending a merry Christmas. Never engage as your family physician a man who will veto all bills treating of cool and soothing drinks.—Nebraska State Journal.

The bodies of five men, riddled with bullets, have been found in the wilds of the Kinishi mountains, Choctaw nation, fifty miles from Denver. They are supposed to be hunters. Fifty yards away was found another dead body, supposed to be one of the attacking party. None of the bodies have been identified, but the general impression is that a fight occurred between the hunters and mountaineers.

WARNER'S SAFE CURE

You are out of sorts; a splendid feeling and appetite one day, while the next day life is a burden. If you drift on in this way you are LIABLE TO BECOME INSANE. Why?

Because poisoned blood on the nerve centres WHEREIN THE MENTAL FACULTIES ARE LOCATED paralyses them and the victim becomes non-responsible.

There are thousands of people to-day IN INSANE ASYLUMS AND GRAVES, PUT THERE BY KIDNEY POISONED BLOOD.

Insanity, according to statistics, is increasing faster than any other disease. Is your eyesight failing? Your memory becoming impaired? An all-gone feeling on slight exertion upon you? The Women of Burmah.

From Carter Harrison's Mandalay Letter.

The women are far from ill-looking, and many are not only pretty but really beautiful. They do not fade and grow old as in Japan and Siam, but continue fair when fat and forty. When looking into their full faces one sees decided beauty. The profile, however is defective They all have the Mongolian cast of face—high cheek-bones short noses and flat visage. These make a bad side-view. They are all self-possessed, without boldness. Easy and graceful in deportment, without either coyness or coquetry. You will ask how I can form an opinion on so short an acquaintance. I will reply I saw many women at the various pagodas visited, in the shops and attending the bazaars, and have fortified the result of my own observation by information gained from men and women who have resided here for many years. Europeans have opportunities for studying this people not given anywhere else in the East—for the intercourse between the sexes is quite as free as anywhere in Christendom. Marriage is simply a civil contract, dissolved at will. When dissolved the property is equally divided between the parties. Certain forms are gone through before the elders and the knot is united. Not only do the women trade and attend the shops, manage the household and do light field-work, but we saw squads of them sweeping the streets in Mandalay.

A dispatch from Cape Town, Africa, says that the Debeers coal mine at Kimberley caught fire. Eight hundred men are entombed. The work of rescue, which began at once, still continues, but it is believed that 500 persons have perished, including Mr. Lindsay, the manager of the company. Many of the victims imprisoned in the mines are white people.

Very Sensible "Japs."

In Japan the old-school physicians are permitted to wear only wooden swords. This is a gently sarcastic way of expressing the opinion that they kill enough people without using weapons. But the druggist who introduced Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery into the Empire, carries a fine steel blade. It was found that all who tried this wonderful remedy for coughs, colds, consumptive tendencies, blood, skin and liver troubles, were, without exception, greatly benefitted. The Mikado himself is said to have "toned up" his system by its use, and the importer was therefore permitted the exceptional honor of wearing the sword of the nobility.

A Learned Seal in Maine.

A seal about two months old was seen recently on the deck of the schooner Arizona, which was moored at Commercial wharf. He is the skippers pet and a great favorite with the crew. The captain said: "I have had the little fellow about six weeks, having caught him at Sable island. He was asleep when I came upon him and before he knew it I had him in my arms. In three days from the time he was taken he was as tame as a dog and will now follow me all over the vessel. In the morning about three o'clock the seal takes his position over the hatch, and there he will cry until some one of the crew goes on deck and feeds him. When we are outside I throw him overboard and let him swim until he is tired, and then he is only too glad to be taken on board again." The little fellow seemed to enjoy himself on the vessel's deck and was very fond of the caresses of the crew. When he saw one of the men approaching him he would hobble toward him and tease for a mouthful of fish, which was generally forthcoming.—Portland Press.

FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

SENATE.

The Senate considered the fisheries treaty and was addressed, in open session, by Mr. Hoar, in opposition to it.

HOUSE.

The House went into committee of the whole on the tariff bill, and an amendment to restore the existing rate of duty on starch was lost.

The duty on rice flour and rice meal was fixed at 15 per cent advalorem.

Mr. Boutelle offered an amendment fixing the rate of duty on dextrine, burnt starch, gum substitute or British gum at 3 cents a pound. Rejected, 56 to 77.

Mr. Vandever, of California, moved to increase the duty on raisins from 1½ to 2 cents a pound (the present duty.) The reduction of duty proposed struck a blow at that rising industry in California and was in favor of the foreign product.

It was rejected, 67 to 77.

Mr. Guenther of Wisconsin endeavored to secure a duty of 5 cents a dozen on eggs, but was unsuccessful.

A motion to restore existing rates on cotton thread, yarns and warps, except in the case of the higher grades, where a slight increase of duty is made, was rejected, 50 to 72.

An amendment was adopted fixing the rate of duty on flax, hackled, known as dressed line, at $10 per ton.

A motion to restore the existing rates of duty on flax, hemp and jute yarns was lost. A motion to fix the rate at percent ad valorem was also lost.

SENATE.

The conference report on the postoffice appropriation bill was presented to the senate. The item for postoffice clerks for unusual business is fixed at $25,000 instead of $50,000. The item as to rent, light and fuel in third-class postoffices is retained, with a provision that a contract for rent for such postoffices shall be for more than a year. The item as to postage on seeds is fixed so as to make the postage one cent for every two ounces. On the subsidy clause, the conference committee was unable to agree. The report was agreed to, and Mr. Plumb moved that the senate insist in the subsidy amendment and ask for a further conference. After a long debate the motion was carried—28 to 16.—It was a strict party vote, except that Messrs Call, Gorman, McPherson and Pugh voted with the Republicans in the affirmative.

HOUSE.

The house is yielding to the temptation to indulge in political debate. The rapid progress of the last few days with the tariff bill was not maintained and the house was given over to stump speaking. Weaver of Iowa, in all the action of the house is counted as a Democrat. While he was a Republican he made a very bitter fight against the Democracy, and left a long series of quotable sentences. Which Henderson of Iowa effectively made use of. Mr. Weaver will hardly be able to recover from the effect of the blows which were delivered by Henderson. The debate seemed to amuse all members of the house except Weaver.

SENATE.

A resolution offered to print extra copies of the committee report on seven vetoed pension bills created quite a breeze.

Mr. Butler spoke of reckless pension legislation in the senate.

Mr. George ended the discussion by moving to proceed to executive business, and immediately began his speech on the fisheries treaty.

HOUSE.

Sessions were ordered for next Wednesday and Thursday nights for bills on labor military affairs.

Mr. Force, of Michigan, from the committee on military affairs, reported back the resolution for the appointment of a special committee to investigate alleged evasions of the contract labor law.

Mr. Cox, of New York, called the attention of the house to the necessity of this resolution to correct the abuses, as there was an abnormal immigration to this country by men persuaded to come here by false and fraudulent pretensions.

Mr. Morrow, of California, was glad that the house at last comprehended the evil besetting the country from unrestricted immigration. The resolution was adopted.

The house then went into committee of the whole (Mr. Springer, of Illinois, in the chair) on the tariff bill, the agreement peing that no vote should be taken on the hending wool schedule.

SENATE.

Mr. Dawes presented a remonstrance of a large number of wool manufacturers and wool dealers against the legislation proposed in the Mills bill. Referred to the committee on finance.

Among the bills reported and placed on the calendar was a house bill appropriating $50,000 for a public building at Wabasha, Minn.

The following bills were passed:

House bill, to authorize the building of a bridge across the Mississippi river at Wabasha, Minn.

House bill appropriating $200,000 for the location of a branch of the National Soldiers' Home in Grant county, Ind.

Mr. Dolph spoke in the senate in opposition to the fisheries treaty. Speaking of a danger of war with Great Britain, he said: With the exposed coasts of the United States, and with its unprotected coastwise commerce, this country did not want a war with Great Britain; and he was equally sure that Great Britain could not afford a war with the United States. Her fortification stations at Halifax, Bermuda and Esquimalt were a menace to American commerce; but no forts could protect the Canadian frontier, and the great ironclads of England could not protect her commerce in a hundred seas. At the call of even the present pro-English administration, in case of war, armed men would spring into the field from every state and territory to make the conquest of the Canadian provinces; and a few months of hostilities would find an American privateer on every sea where a British merchant vessel was to be found.

HOUSE.

On motion of Mr. Biggs, of California, a bill passed for the mining debris question in California.

Mr. Blount, of Georgia, submitted the conference report on the postoffice appropriation bill: An agreement has been arrived at on all amendments. The rate of postage on seeds, plants, roots, bulbs and scions has been fixed at one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof.

The report was agreed to, and then Mr. Bingham, of Pennsylvania, moved to concur in the senate "subsidy" amendment, with an amendment reducing the appropriation from $800,000 to $450,000, authorizing the postmaster general to increase the mail facilities not only between the United States and Central and South America, and the West Indies, but between the United States and China and Japan, the Sandwich Islands and Australia, and providing that American ships carrying the mails shall be allowed four times the rate of compensation they now receive. A long debate ensued.

SENATE.

It is generally thought by Republican senators that their party in the senate will formulate a substitute for the Mills bill, report it, place it in the calendar and there let it remain until the next session. It is argued that such a plan would show the country the Republican position on the tariff and an early adjournment could be reached; that to undertake to pass the tariff bill in the senate would prolong the session into September, and that every political purpose would be served by formally reporting the bill.

HOUSE.

The House resumed the consideration of the the "subsidy" amtendment of the Senate to the postoffice appropriation bill. After debate Mr. Bingham's motion to concur in the Senate amendment, with an amendment was lost—yeas, 56; nays, 135.

By a vote of yeas, 141; nays, 57 the House further insisted on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and a further conference was ordered.

The House then went into committee of the whole (Mr. Springer, of Illinois, in the chair), on the tariff bill, the pending schedule being that relative to wool.

The retirement of Mr. Lothrop from the position of minister to Russia on the ground of ill health has given rise to a number of rumors as to his probable successor. One of the reports is that Mr. Phillips is to be transferred from London to St. Petersburg, and a part of this rumor is that "Pat" Collins of Boston, the presiding officer at the St. Louis convention, is to be sent to London.

A Strange Romance.

From The Atlanta Constitution.

Dr. Hardin, as his name shall be for this occasion [now dead], had but lately arrived in Americus, Ga., from Savannah. Being a gentlemen of polished address he soon found admission into the best circles of society. and at once became indispensable all social gatherings. With the ladies he was a prime favorite. With one in particular he formed a close friendship, for it developed that he had fought in the trenches with her brother, and it was into his arms that the wounded man fell, when he was staggered by the bullet which caused his death.

One day Miss Julia, with her widowed mother, went out on that most important duty of a woman's life—the purchase of a bridal trosseau. Society had pretty well guessed the course of affairs. Congratulations poured in upon the young lady, all of which she accepted with becoming modesty. The groom expectant, however, acted mysteriously. He never made reference to the happy affair with which his name was linked. When a friend congratulated him he looked puzzled, but offered no invitation to proceed.

Thus weeks passed, until the date popularly supposed to have been set for the nuptials had gone by. The doctor moved about the city in his usual unconcern. The young lady held her grief and disappointment sacred, and ventured no word of censure or complaint. In fact the mystery became so great that the question as to whether the couple had ever been engaged or not became one of violent local agitation.

The soldier friends of the young lady's brother, feeling that she was without male protection, determined that she should not be imposed upon. They met, to the number of a dozen, late one evening, by the cotton warehouse of Harold & Johnson, and agreed to call on the doctor and get an explanation. They reached his room, and were told that he had gone out not five minutes before for a walk, and would not be back until after midnight. In order to fill in the time until that hour, the party went to Miss Julia's house to consult her about the matter. They were surprised to find the doctor there, while near him sat the young lady in tears.

One of the men, maddened at the doctor's icy indifference, rushed over to him and grasping him by the shoulder, shook him violently. The doctor yawned deeply; he arose, and rubbed his eyes, and looking around him in the utmost bewilderment, asked:

"How came I here? This is so very strange. I went to bed in my room at 8 o'clock, and thought until this moment that I was still there."

He was a somnambulist!

In the talk which followed the whole matter was made plain. After having visited Miss Julia twice, he began coming at 9 o'clock, when he was not expected. His manner was somewhat stiff and formal, but he pressed his suit with perseverance. He would never make the remotest reference to any other subject. He never thought of leaving until a few minutes before 1 in the morning. His late hour in coming, his late hour in leaving, always seemed strange, but as his behavior was most circumspect, it was not thought of after the first few nights. Thus he proposed, was accepted, and the date appointed, and passed it over. In his waking hours he had no recollection whatever of the events of the night before.

After the matter had been thus made plain, the doctor said:

"Now, Miss Julia, since all this has transpired in my sleep, I may as well tell you that your image has been impressed upon my heart all along. Will you consent again to my proposal."

It was too plain that no opposition existed there. Soon the license was procured, the minister called in, and the happy pair made one.

But one chapter more remains to be told. When the yellow fever broke out in Savannah with such virulence about ten years ago, Dr. Hardin was one of the most zealous in waiting upon the sick in that city. He never refused the call of duty. At last he, too, succumbed to the dread destroyer, and he now sleeps with the silent majority.

A Story of a Slave Who Had the Squirrel's Vice of Overhoarding.

From the Atlanta Constitution.

Brown's Mound, in Twiggs county, was a part of the princely domain of a middle Georgia planter. This planter owned a slave who was a miser. Such instances are not uncommon among the Southern negroes. This negro was rather previleged above the ordinary slaves, and his master allowed him to cultivate a little patch on the mound and keep the proceeds for himself. Many a handful of cotton and many a peck of peanuts did it take to accumulate a hoard of gold amounting to about $300. But it was done. No one knew the hiding place of this fund. The other negroes had a natural dislike for the miser who "wus so mighty curious in 'e ways." At dead of night he would unearth his treasures and seek a safer spot for deposit. He gloated over it, and listened with delighted ears to the jingle of the precious coin. Then came Wilson's cavalry, leaving death and desolation in their train.

They learned of the poor negro's hoarded treasure, and some of the troopers caught him and tried to force him to reveal his secret. In some way he escaped and fled in the night. After searching for some time after the whirlwind of war had passed they found him wandering aimlessly about the little patch on the mound. He was rendered insane by the fright. When asked where was his money, the reply would come short and sharp: "Hid on the moun'." He had forgotten its hiding place, and others tried in vain to assist him in finding the spot where it was buried. It is now a neglected place, where quail shooting would be fine were it not for the rattlesnakes that infest the nooks and crannies of the mound.

Patrick Joseph O'Brien, member of the British parliament, was released from the Tullamore jail, his time of service under the sentence of three months' imprisonment imposed on him for violation of the crimes act having expired. He was immediately taken in charge by officers and conveyed to the Kilkenny jail, where he will undergo a further imprisonment of three months for an offense of the same nature.

The governor of Missouri absolutely declined to grant a commutation of the sentence against Hugh M. Brooks, alias Maxwell, but granted a respite for four weeks. Brooks was very much downcast on receipt of the news. He said he had felt confident that the governor would grant his appeal for commutation, but now all hope was gone and he must prepare for the end.

THE CAPTAIN'S STORY.

"Well, sir," said the old captain to me—a retired shipmaster, with the gaze of a vulture under the apparently sleepy lid, and a face full of lines and discoloration like the wrinkling of currents in the glassy swathes of a dead calm on some dingy spread of water off the West African coast—"I had been always a bit superstitious up to then, but I own that that job cured me. But it made me see also that it isn't reasonable to be too contemptuous of one's fellow-creatures who believe in spirits and manifestations of which there is no organ, sense or quality in human body to take notice of, saving credulity.'

It comes to this, sir: human nature never gets beyond a certain pass. We sail to that point, and then the wind shifts, and we drop astern. From time to time it is put into us to think foolishly, that the thoughtful amongst us may understand how little ahead of the old folks we are in spite of all our discoveries. I've watched this fad of ghosts amongst us of late; the growth of societies which aim to enlarge men's knowledge of what doesn't exist, and it takes me back to the days when I was a young 'un, when there were still witches in the country, and old women were ducked and drowned for sailing athwart the moonlight on broom-sticks. We were a bit coarser then in our superstitions than now, made our ghosts hags instead of spirits of beauty, fled from candles in turnips, and reckoned when old Bogey wanted us he arrived down the chimney. But the quality remains the same. It is only brightened in these times, polished up and made to look in other days finer. Now, however, to give you my yarn.

"I was master of a ship of eight hundred tons. We were loaded with a general cargo, bound to the east Indies. It is many years ago, when ships' companies were numerous, partly through the compulsion of the navigation laws, partly because owners wanted their ships to keep afloat, partly because you wouldn't have got sailors to ship if there had not been hands to do the work; and my complement numbered between forty and forty-five men. In a crowd of this kind one doesn't take particular notice. When the crew are few you come to know your Jims, and Joes, and Toms, as you come to know your dogs at home, or as a man who is worth only a few shillings is not only conscious of what he has in his pocket, but can tell you the character of the coins also. We were without passengers, simply a well manned cargo vessel, all of the olden time, though a handsome boat in her way: frigate-built, painted ports, wide channels, great black tops, the yards square enough to serve a line of battle-ship, and the royals, when mast-headed, sitting close against the trucks—the properest topping off to my taste, to the fabric of a full-rigged ship. We had been out a fortnight, when in the afternoon there came on a sudden squall. The fore and mizzen topgallant sails were clewed up, with a hand standing by at the main top gallant halliards. I noticed some figures in the forerigging going aloft to roll up the sail there, and then on a sudden there was a commotion: a running of men forward and a gathering of them into a heap around something. I told the mate to go and see what was the matter. He returned with the news that a man in the act of going aloft had fallen dead on the deck of the rail. We were without a doctor, and all hands looked to me in a case of this kind. I walked to where the man lay, and found him to be an able seaman; an old yellow-haired man, whose face I had before taken notice of for the ghastly complexion of it; a sort of dusky, parchment-like hue, the color of a sailor's duff that's been too long in the coppers. The lids were half closed, nothing but the whites showing; the lips set hard in a sort of half grin, without froth, and the arms outstretched in the posture of a crucified person. Short of a skeleton, to my notion, one ought to never be able to say cock-surely, pointing to a body, 'this is death.' The fellow might be in a faint or in a fit, or in a cataleptic; his body in death's straight jacket, and the mind within all alive and wondering what the deuce has gone wrong outside. I ordered him to be carried to his bunk and to be rubbed, and to be treated as if he was to be brought to, and if that failed then to be stowed away out of sight of the men; but not to be stitched up for a bit, so that if there was any spark of life in him it might have a chance. The fact is I wanted to make sure he was a dead man before he was tossed overboard—a very proper feeling in me, no doubt, though there was a touch of morbidity in it, too, for, to tell the truth, the one quite horror of my life in those days the thought of being buried alive, and what I feared for myself I was not the sort of a man to put upon another."

"Well after two days we were all agreed that he was dead, so I gave orders for him to be stitched up and brought to the gangway, and next morning after breakfast we held the service. It was always my desire that matters of this kind should be carried out with proper solemnity. I considered it worked as a wholesome influence among the sailors, who were made to understand that a dead seaman on the ocean was to be treated as if he were a dead pauper out of a workhouse; that a show of respect and regret, at all events, should go to his funeral, since a shipmate is a shipmate the wide world over. The body, stitched in its hammock, with a sinker stowed away in the clews, was placed upon a grating and covered with the ensign. Then the grating was lifted by four men and brought to the rail, one end of it resting there, the other end supported by two men, who stood ready to whip off the ensign and let the body slide when the time should come for so doing. All hands gathered around, washed and clean. It was a quiet morning, a light breeze of wind blowing the ship under all plain sail, everything silent aloft, the deck heaving slightly to the small beam sea. I came out of the cabin with my prayer-book in my hand and started to read, the men baring their heads, with the grinding here and there of a jaw upon a hunk of tobacco standing high in the cheek-bone, and much wistful and inquisitive peering at poor Jack's outline by eyes bleared by the gales of wind into which they had started. I was proceeding, reading with great emphasis and solemnity, when there arose from under the ensign a short muffled, groaning sort of cry of 'For God's sake cut me adrift, mates. I'm suffocating.' The prayer-book fell from my hand, the two fellows who were holding the grating let go of it and bolted forward, whereupon off rolled the body on to the deck amongst the feet of the sailors, who, letting fly a volley of curses in their alarm, bolted in all directions, some of them even jumping into the rigging. Had a bombshell exploded amongst us the clearance effected could not have been more complete.

"The mates had run away as well as the seamen, and the cowardice of all hands quickly put temper enough in me to rally my nerves. 'Quick,' I bawled; 'cut the poor wretch adrift or he'll be suffocated in good earnest, and it will be a worse murder done than had we buried him.' On this the chief mate and some others came to the body, shouldering one another, and ripped open the hammock. Well, dead or alive, 'twould have been better to have given the thing its last toss than to have witnessed such a sight. You see it was warmish weather, and the body besides had been but I'll say no more on that; only that such an apparition rising before the stoutest army that ever took the field would have sent it flying without waiting for the buglars to sound. But he'd called out that he was suffocating, and we looked to see him move, all hands comming up in bunches at a time, till there we were all of a heaving and squirming muddle, with this horror in the midst of us, and the men squirted juice in all directions through sheer loathing. 'If that man ben't dead,' said the bo'som, 'my eyes ain't mates.' 'Did he wriggle at all?' said I, addressing one of the fellows who held the grating, 'before you let go and run away?' The man answered he hadn't noticed any movement. 'He spoke, anyway,' said the mate. "Well, pickle my eyes for onions if there was ever a rummier start than this,' cried the carpenter, stooping to look close at the man, and then recoiling, with a heave of the breast and a long wipe of his mouth down the length of his hairy arm. I ordered the body to be carried to a cabin, and put the second mate, along with a seaman, to watch it, but their report to me was that if the fellow was alive he gave no signs of it, but that, on the contrary, he was imitating death so incomparably as to oblige them to beg me to allow some others to relieve them, as they did not feel strong enough to go on. I then viewed the body myself, and no longer having a doubt, gave orders that it should be stitched up afresh, and once again brought to the gangway. It was now eight bells in the afternoon. Of course it was right that this old Jack should be buried decently, and I resolved to go through with the funeral service, but I let it be known that there was no obligation upon the men to attend, outside the few who were needed to do the work. Nevertheless, all hands turned up as before. Well I started to read as I had in the morning, but at the very moment of my pronouncing the same words I was delivering when the interruption happened there came a most audible but half-choking and half-smothered groan or grunt of "Oh, Lord, they mean to drown me after all!" from under the ensign. The fellow that held the right corner of the grating let go, and went backing among his mates with a cry of dismay, but the other man, bawling out with a face darkened by passion, "You old villian! how many burials d'ye expect, and be d—d to you!" tilted the grating, and away flashed the hammock overboard. We all stood looking on like idiots. For my part, captain as I was, I hadn't a word to say for a moment. In fact I was thunderstruck. The groan of the corpse was scarce out of my ear before the body was gone, and yet you couldn't think of us as having drowned him either, for nothing could have seemed deader than did this old Jack when I took my last view of him. However, no purpose could be served by making a fuss; it was one of those breaches of discipline that defy your cool reason though you may handle them as you will in a passion. Besides, a moment or two's reflection, coupled with a look round, satisfied me that the men would be easier in their minds for being quit of the body, and so, telling the mate to send the hands forward, I went to my cabin; but more mystified, under a livelier consternation of mind, in short, than it would suit me to admit to everybody. It was idle to talk of tricks. I might have reconciled myself to some notion of that kind had I made one or two or three spectators; but there had been forty or fifty of us all lumped together, and the reality of the thing came out in the sincerity of the fright, for the morning panic was much greater than I have put it, whilst the terror in the afternoon might have shown as wild had the fellows at the grating let fall the body again amongst the men.

"Well, at 10 o'clock that night I left the deck to lie down. All was quiet. The influence of that day's work was expressed in the manner of the men, who had moved and talked very soberly, with subdued gestures and tones, and in dog-watches I had noticed them hanging together in knots, conversing like people fresh from an execution. I was aroused from my sleep by the second mate, who had charge of the deck. 'There's the whole watch below, sir, come aft to complain that they can't get any rest.' 'What's the matter,' said I, starting up. 'Why, they say they can hear old Jack's voice calling to them down in the forepeak.' 'Old Jack's voice!' I cried, and with that I followed him on deck, where, sure enough, I found all hands massed together on the quarter-deck. 'What's the matter, men?' I called out, leaning over the rail at the break of the poop to speak to them. The carpenter spoke up: 'There's old Jack hailing us in the forepeak, sir.' 'Nonsense, man.' 'Smite me, sir, if it ain't the blooming truth: not only hailing, but a cussing of us for having drowned him.' 'But you must know that that can't be,' said I; he's leagues astern and fathoms deep.' A voice answered; 'He's cussin' us all the same. He swears he'll haunt us all overboard,' I told the second mate to go forward and report if he could hear of this strange voice. A shadowy group of men went with him; indeed I doubt if he would have had heart to drop into the fore-castle alone. Presently he returned, coming aft with a run and speaking with a broken breath: 'It's true, sir,' he gasped, 'if it isn't old Jack it's the devil. I heard him say, "I'll punish all of ye for drowning of me. Head as you will 'tis old Jack as is at the hellum now, and so stand by!"' 'But, good thunder!' cried I, 'how is a man's voice going to sound in the forecastle out of the forepeak? Answer me that, you fool.' 'Well, come forrards and hear it yourself, sir,' he exclaimed, sullenly.

"I instantly assented and walked forward, followed by all hands; and not without a beating heart I admit, but with a good air of carelessness upon me I stepped into the forecastle. It was a top-gallant forecastle entered by two doors abreast of the windlass ends; a slush lamp swung under the beam, and the light was very weak. I entered with the second mate, and stood listening. For some miutues nothing sounded but the hard breathing of the seamen, who filled the doorways, squeezing the foremost in, though these pressed back like a wall, making such a jam as might account for louder snorings. Queer creakings and groanings arose out of the slightly swaying hull in the silence, with the faint sound of the bow wave softly washing from the cut-water. Then on a sudden I heard a dim, hoarse voice—weakened, as it were, by the deck between, with a note of rage in it as though the fellow could scarcely articulate for his teeth being fixed—exclaim: 'Curse the ship, I say! curse all hands in her, says I. I'm a murdered man, and I'll haunt ye all.' 'There, sir,' cried the second mate, backing to the men, whose breathing was now stormy with emotion. Scarce was this said when one of the seamen, who had apparently been, forced foward by the pressure of the others was run almost up to me by the long arm of the chief mate; who, unperceived by me, had worked his way into the crowd to learn what was going on. This mate stood over six feet high and was a giant in strength, and the head of the fellow whom his shoulder-of-mutton fist grasped by the scruff of the neck was on a level with his chin. 'Here's the ghost sir,' said he. The sailors now came bundling in in a swarm. 'This is the ghost,' repeated the mate, giving the fellow a shake which threatened to throw his head off his neck. ''Tis deuced clever, my lad, but it's a joke that wants sea room,' another shake. 'Own to it, own to it!' he cried, 'before I screw your neck off.' 'I own to it,' said the man. 'Own to what.' I asked. 'Why, sir,' answered the mate, 'he has the trick of throwing his voice, and wonderfully well he does it, too. I had my eye on him this afternoon and suspected him. I'm sure of it, now, for he didn't know I stood close behind him.'
